Most complaints, it says, come from petrol stations. Dockings of more than half of net wages are not uncommon. But it has been contacted by bus conductors, London Transport staff, and local authority sports and leisure staff. Managers of newsagents have leading maternity hospital were kept secret before the general election because of their political sensitivity, a hospital official said yesterday.

According to Mr Ted Hayward, house governor of Queen Charlotte's Hospital, London, the Department of Health and Social Security wrote to all health administrators advising them not to publish documents that could be construed as politically delicate.

As a result, Queen Charlotte's Hospital decided not to publicize proposals to close its postoperation recovery unit at St Leonards, East Sussex, until after the election. Queen Charlotte's and its sister hospital, the Chelsea Hospital for Women, face a deficit of £60,000 this year and believe they can save nearly £200,000 by closing the recovery unit.

That would enable them to provide care-cots for sick newborn babies, improve cancer treatment, and develop a new

He said the hospital had received a letter from the

As more and more British families spend the summer abroad, many English seaside resorts are making strenuous efforts to adapt to changing tastes. Others believe their best chance of survival lies in reinforcing their traditional image. In the second part of his survey of British holiday spots, Alan Hamilton visits two resorts determined to hold onto familiar though contrasting clientele. Great Yarmouth offers relentless jollity;

But it is not the flowers, or the absence of loud vulgarity, or Russ Conway, or even the kind climate, that is Eastbourne's principal attraction to the elderly holidaymaker. The main is, it is dead flat. Even the walk from the adjacent coach park to the 575 ft breezy cliff of Beachy Head is only marginally steeper than walking on water.

Nevertheless the town faces a dilemma. It caters well for the elderly, with two concerts a day every day of the season at its very superior bandstand and wheelchair ramps at all pave-ment crossings, but the elderly, even the comfortably-off elderly who all seem to be called Gwen or Joan, are not big spenders. chip shop in my experience to offer a choice of Liebfraumilch or Anjou Rosé as an accompaniment to a fish supper. I was still the only customer. Anyway, the only proper accompaniment to English fish and chips is strong tea.

Eastbourne's dilemma is that wants to broaden its appeal without alienating its existing clientele. "I have had to resist very strong pressure from a commercial promoter who wants to put a circus on the beach here," Michael Mitchell, the town's director of tourism and leisure, says. Two-thirds of the holidaymakers are regulars who have been coming for years, and Eastbourne dares not

Caravans and camping are discouraged, and anyone who draws up on the prom in a Dormobile intending to spend the night in his vehicle is liable to be moved on. Yet the town can hardly be accused of snobbishness; the only major development permitted on the seafront in recent years has been an enormous and luxurious convalescent home for the Transport and General Work-Union. The objections at the time were based architecture rather than astbourne's astbourne's long-term development plans in-clude the possibility of a yacht marina and a rather superior activity park. "We are looking at Disneyland to see if there are any ideas we can borrow," Mitchell says. "But for heavens's sake don't give the impression we are ening to impression we are going to build another Disneyland in Eastbourne." Good Lord, no; it would be the ruin of the place.

Disneyland, on the other hand, is exactly what Great Yarmouth would give its last jar of cockles to have on the front. Whereas Eastbourne has survived on tidiness and gentility, pandering to the holiday taste for doing nothing in particular provided it is done in the warm, Great Yarmouth continues to exist by strict adherence to the opposite adherence to the opposite school the school of relentless entertainment.

You cannot get away from comedians in Great Yarmouth. Eastbourne's hoteliers esti-mate that bookings for 1982 swimming pool being unbearab-were down by one-fifth on the ly jovial at 11 in the morning, teaching a group of reluctant old ladies the steps of something called the Slosh. There are comedians in every large hotel, every holiday camp and, of course, at the end of the pier.

Ian Tough and his tiny wife Jeanette, who perform as the Krankies, are top of the bill at Yarmouth's end-of-pier sum-mer show. This is the factorybelt audience; they still want the old gags. The summer shows are the one place left where you can still get a genuine belly-laugh. You'd never do anything sophisticated here."

But, Tough finds, summer shows are not what they were.
"Our season starts two weeks later than it used to do; the audiences just aren't there in May and June like they used to be. And the shows themselves have been cut. Ours only has six dancers where it used to have 10; that's Equity rates for you. But at least we still have a 10-piece band. When they start cutting the band, that's the beginning of the end." Don Reid's summer show, on the other hand, survives with a band of only two, an organist and drummer. Reid is heading eight-strong company of relative unknowns in a summer revue at Gorleston Pavilion, and he was not at all amused to have them described as a concert party. "We are all full-time professionals here; a concert party is a bunch of hasbeens, amateurs or retired pros who are past it."

On their opening night they had a half-full house of about 160, and most of those were landladies on complimentary tickets. Always invite the landladies on opening night; they will spread the word more effectively than any advertisement. The dearest seat in the house is £2 and, Reid says, they expect to play to the elderly, and to young families who cannot afford a holiday abroad.

The potential audience in the Great Yarmouth area is immense, it being the most densely bedded area of the entire country, with 100,000 holiday beds in the immediate area, half of them self-catering. And a great many of them are in holiday camps, some of which have become far removed from the Hi-de-Hi image.

Brian Potter always dines with the 500 guests at his holiday club (to him the word 'camp" is taboo) on the basis of what's good enough for them.

As we waver between the roast pork and the rainbow trout he leaps to the microphone and addresses the assembly. I fear he is going to say: "Hello campers," but instead he asks those who have been in previous years to raise their hands for my benefit. At least three quarters do.

"There you are," he beams proudly. "Loyalty." He then digs out Tom and Dora, who have been coming every year since 1946.

Buses are cheep and so is the small but clean, efficient Metro that runs along the Alameda or Semando O'Higgins Avenue, the main thoroughtars. Taxis are reasonable and plentiful and necessary sometimes as the bus stations are away from the centre of the city.

My advice to anyone going to Chile is to read up about the country, get up-to-date information from the embassy in London, and when in Santiago to spend the first day or so walking around and studying the plan of the Metro. It will save you a good many dollars.

As I walked by the Beagle Channel, trailing my hands in its cold waters, I tried to think back to the days when Darwin first came to Tierra del Fuego. On that journey Captain Fitzroy was to return to the Land of Fire Jemmy Button, York Minster, and the young girl, Fuegia Basker, whom he had seized as hostages three years before for the loss of a boat and whom he had taken to England to educate and instruct in religion at his own expense. Boat Memory, the fourth native died in England. The seasons, of course, are reversed here, and it was towards the end of summer. The sun shone, the countryside was green and lush, the forests were alive with a variety of colourful birds and I even got to within six feet of two large and beautiful red-headed peckers. Streams rushed down the hills, the water sparkling as it splashed over rounded pebbles, and in the stillness and beauty of sun-dappled glades I could have been in north Wales or the Lake District.

There is one small hotel on the island (the Hoskria Walda, run by the navy) but I stayed in the Cafe Huspachum (the name is Yahgan for Puerto Luisa, the former name of Puerto Williams) in rather primitive conditions with tough and cheerful dockyard and construcon the Rhine in 1925 and is now a marvellous play place for servicemen's children.

A maritime curiosity in the post is the prow of the Chilean ship the Yelcho which rescued the British expedition under Sir Ernest Schackleton (their quaint spelling) from Elephant Island on August 30, 1916. And a more recent British connexion is to be found in the small but imaginatively set out museum of Martin Gusinde, a priest who saved and collected many Indian relics, where, besides the many items connected with the Beagle, is a signed double paddie that commemorates the British kayak expedition round Cape Horn in 1977.

Puerto Williams is a sprawiing rather ugly town, but it is surrounded by some of the most dramatic scenery in the world. It was a joy to be there in the summer, but in winter when the howling gales sweep in from the Atlantic and the Pacific it must be one of the coldest and bleakest places on earth.

I never saw any fires in this Land of Fire, and of the poor, ill-clad and wretched Yahganes there is only one left, and this middle-aged woman runs_a grocery shop on the island. For me, however, it was the culmination of one of my ambitions, and although it had taken me a lifetime to achieve it, it had been well worth the. waiting and the journeying.

Barley Mow Passage, London W4 Northern missions of the last frontier

We all know, from films and picture books, that California, the final frontier of the United States, was colonized as settlers moved west. What is less wellknown is the movement from Mexico from 1769 to 1823, when Franciscan monks made their way north establishing missions. These were to become staging posts for travellers and sanctuaries against the maraud-ing Indians. By 1823, there were 21 missions, all about one day's brisk walk apart and providing shelter and food.

The active period of the missions was short. The work of 65 years was ended in 1834 by the secularization law, which aimed to turn some of the land over to Indian families. Never-theless, many of the original churches are still in use and part or all of every mission has been restored, providing a focal point today for tourists, taking them away from the freeways and crowded beaches of California into lesser-known parts of this beautiful state.

As with so much history, it was a desire to colonize that led to the establishment of the missions. In the late 1760s, when Spanish influence in Mexico was waning the Fran-ciscan monks asked Charles II of Spain if they could establish missions in California. This suited the king, who even then was afraid of Russia moving down from the Bering Strait into the unknown lands of Alta California Code. (Upper) California. God and mammon came together - the

The missions gave their names to many towns in California and parts of the main highway follow El Camino Real,

the king's road, which joined together all the missions. Though the missions have much in common - they all have heavy adobe walls, red-tiled overhanging roofs to protect them from the sun and Spanish-style churches - each mission has a unique feature its architecture, its church or painting, the reconstruction of the very humble quarters in which the monks lived, or simply its giorious setting.

Of course in California one needs a car, so landing at Los Angeles airport, drive south to San Diego where the first mission was established in

The history of the San Diego de Alcala mission was typical of many, Fights with Indians were common, priests were murdered by them, though in some missions Indians were enthusiastic worshippers. The move to turn land over to Indian families failed. Many of them immediately sold to speculators who had set up omes around the missions. As result modern California developed. Rich rewards when you cast your brood upon the waters

On the waterfront: Boating on the upper reaches of the Thames

We moored at Goring for the night without mishap, gently nudging our 37ft Thames cruiser into a tight gap between similar boats. At 7.30 pm supper was long overdue: The baked beans, the children's stanle fare, were still unopened. The tin-opener proved ineffective and slewed along the rim of the can. I recalled the incident in Three Men in a Boat, where George, Montmorency and Harris launched a frenzied attack on a can of pineapple. Much more of this and I too would take the boat hook to the obdurate tin. Instead, though, my wife went off along the quay and borrowed a tin-opener from a boat near by.

West of Reading, the Thames is a vast slow thoroughfare free from the frustrations encountered daily by both motorists and pedestrians. One rule is you must pass all oncoming boats on the right; everything else is relaxed and gentlemanly.

The distance covered in a weekend is limited but there's still plenty of fun to be had -more so if there are plenty of locks. Locks are an endless source of amusement.

Stopping a boat weighing six tonnes alongside a narrow jetty before entering a lock is not casy. The trick seems to be to get the nose tied up first. However, if there is a wind from the stern the rear of the hoat can swing out into mid-

By now we were "experi-enced" boatmen. The five locks back down to Reading pre-sented little problem; one or two heavy bumps at lock entrances and a nervous 10 minutes going through a regatta near Reading where the eights sped towards us like hydrofoils.

One of the additional delights of the river is the variety of water fowl to be seen; moor-hens, Canada geese, herons, coots, swans, crested grebe and kingfisher - all were spotted by my daughter Hannah.

Gains and consolidations as the transatlantic air price war gathers momentum entice you on board.

In theory, practically all the hundreds of bargain air fares can be sold by any travel agent. In practice many agents are still unaware of all the options, so to get the best deal the average traveller will have to do most of the groundwork himself.

Generally speaking, there are no discounted bucket-shop type of fares available to the USA. When airlines have the freedom, as they have on transatlantic routes, to tailor their fares to meet market demands they do not need to indulge in under the counter activities.

Hardly a week goes by without a new fares or routing being announced so deep an eye on the airline advertisements in war promises to intensify this autumn when the major airlines plan even lower fares. Until then, here is a roundup of what is available for travel in July

Special economy fares:

AEREBORG. Originally introduced at a rockbottom price to compete with Laker, these fares have been hiked substantially since the dimise of Skytrain. Available to all main destinations on either a one-way or return basis. Openjaw (travel to one destination, return from another) arrangements are possible. There are few booking restrictions and this is an ideal ticket if you want flexibility at an economical price. Sample one-way fares: New York £218, Chicago £273, San Francisco/Los Angeles/ Seattle £329 and Miami £225.

Stand-by:

In the Laker days these were scheduled airlines' cheapest fares, but not any more. They are now thought of as an unnecessary nuisance, and the airlines plan to screp them this autumn. Available on a oneway, return or open-jaw basis. Sample one-way fares New York £175, Chicago £238, San Francisco/LA £227 and Miami

The most popular promotional fare. Available on a return or open-jaw basis. Although more expensive than charter fares, APEX offers you a wider choice of destinations, departure dates

With ticket sales well down on nations in Canada or the can be accepted within 21 days previous years the airlines are Caribbean. For example, travel offering all sorts of deals to out London/New York and return Toronto/London, or out London/Chicago and return Nassau/London, Travel can also be in the reverse direction. Sample return fares to single destinations: Atlanta £379, Boston £313, Chicago £366, New York £329, Miami £390, Dallas/San Francisco/LA/ Seanle £449. If you book a British Airways or TWA APEX fare with operators like Jetsave or Travellers you get extra goodies thrown in, such as a free flight bag, free in-flight drinks and movies, half-price travel on British Rail

Charters:

Available only to the main destinations. Some flights operate infrequently and open-jaw arrangements are strictly limited. Operators tend to specia-lize in certain routes and prices fluctuate depending on supply

Examples of approximate return fares with the operator shown in brackets: New York £245 (Airplan), £289 (American Express); Chicago £319 (Air-plan); Philadelphia £249 (Airplan): San Francisco £379 (Falcon), £399 (Airplan); Boston £269 (Airplan); Washington £289 (Airplan). Slade Travel is the only company to sell seats to New York on either a one-way or return basis. Slade's fare is £129 each way until September 11 when the price falls to just £85.

Consolidation:

A new exciting fare: Specialist operators like Airplan, Slade and Falcon book blocks of seats on scheduled flights which they then sell to individuals at a considerable discount on the cheapest APEX fare. Consolidation fares are available only for return travel to a limited number of destinations. Each operator specializes in different destinations and airlines.

Examples, with the operator shown in brackets: Atlanta £370 (Airplan); Dallas £380 (Airplan), £410 (Slade); Denver E380 (Airplan), Flouston £390 (Airplan), £420 (Slade); Los Angeles £399 (Falcon), £420 (Slade); Mizmi £359 (Falcon); New York £306 (Slade); San Francisco £420 (Slade); Tampa

£349 (Falcon). Note: APEX, consolidation and charter fares must be booked at least 21 days in destination for at least seven days. Sometimes reservations

The arrival of People Express and its cut-price unrestricted fares has revolutionized travel to the US East Coast. People's £99 fare to New York is well known. Not so well known are People's special through fares via New York to onward destinations on its network.

Examples of one-way fares (return double): Boston, Baltimore, Washington, Pittsburgh, Buffalo (gateway for Toronto, Canada), Burlington, Hartford and Portland, all £110; Jacksonville and West Palm Beach in Florida cost £127 and £140 respectively.

People Express is not allowed to operate more than five flights a week and with fares as low as these it might be difficult to get a seat in the peak season.

There is a one-way luxury £291 Premium class fare on offer too. An ideal way of crossing the Atlantic in style at a fraction of what the major

Internal US travel:

Provided you buy your ticket here before you set out, there are some amazing bargains to be had. Several airlines offer Airpasses. These either offer so many flights free of charge or, better still, unlimited travel for a specified number of days. Examples: Continental Air-

Continen-tal also offers books of flight coupons, valid for stays of up to 60 days, costing $325 for four, $399 for 12 and $575 for 18. This airline also offers the cheapest coast-to-coast fares. If you travel on a Tuesday or a Saturday you pay just $119 (a fare of $149 applies on other days) to travel between any one of seven cities on both the East and West Coasts.

Collecting

Sad tale of Uncle Eustace's not-so-priceless legacy

"I can't take the credit for collecting all this lovely old china", the owner confessed. "It was all left to me by my Uncle Eustace, complete with this superb cabinet - genuine Sheraton, of course,"

"Not quite", said the valuer.
"Not really. Not", he announced with a sudden burst of courage,
"by any stretch of the imagination. It's what is known in the trade as 'Edwardian Sheraton' . a popular breed produced in the early years of the century. This century" he added, lest there should be any doubts lingering in the owner's mind.

"It displays", he continued, "all the fussy detail and the general air of old-maidishness that the Edwardians liked to believe were the essence of lateeighteenth-century design.

"Well", bridled the owner, "perhaps it wasn't made by Sheraton personally."

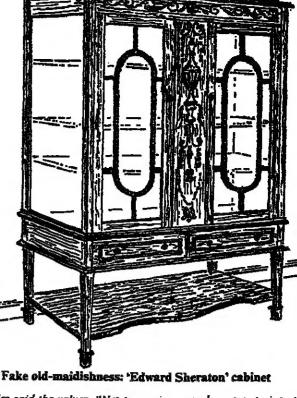

"Neither was any piece of furniture in existence, so far as we know", the valuer interrupted. "Sheraton was a designer rather than a practising cabinet-maker. But he never designed anything very close to this, and it wasn't made until about a hundred years after his death."
"Uncle Eustace was quite, quite sure about it."

"So am I. It shouts '1900' -not '1800'. With few exceptions, late-Georgian china cabinets had wooden ends, not glass ones. They did not usually have shelves of this kind near the floor. That form of superstructure, or cresting-piece, on the top would have been unthinkable before about 1890. The drawer-sides are mahogany, whereas Georgian ones would have been in oak or possibly cedar. As for the proportions -

"Please, don't go on. I accept your verdict. Poor Uncle Eustace! Not to mention poor

"Not as poor as all that. Good Edwardian furniture, with marquetry decoration of this kind, is now sought after in its own right, and the insurance value of your cabinet must be put at about £600. But don't expect as much if you sell it to a dealer. Allow for the difference between wholesale and retail

The Waterperry estate - the name probably meant pear orchard - is mentioned in the Domesday Book and for seven hundred years was held by two families, the Fitzelys and the Cursons. Their histories are recorded in the little church, next to Waterperry House, which is a Norman and Early English building containing the remnants of an even smaller

The frontage of Waterperry House was rebuilt in the Queen Anne style by Sir John Curson in 1713. The Henley family bought the estate in 1830 and it was sold to Magdalen College in 1925. Seven years later Waterperry Horticultural School was opened by Miss Beatrix Havergal and it was in her time that the fine Alpine nursery was largely developed.

Heady pleasures of a perfumed bed

A garden at its best will give pleasure to all the senses - not least the sense of smell. There are countless varieties of scented plants, shrubs and herbs to choose from, and most are as attractive as they are fragrant.

One obvious choice would be the Eucalyptus. For its perfume, I prefer E globulus, although E. Gunnii, the famous Australian blue gum, is the most hardy for this country. It needs protection and a well drained site, and its foliage is strongly scented when crushed or bruised.

Populus balsamifera has a strong scented foliage without crushing or bruising, particularly early in the year as the leaves are opening. I much prefer the form P candicans Aurora with its creamy white and delicate pink leaves. To encourage the coloured leaves, it needs to be pruned hard every other year.

Some perfumed plants have or R Eglanteria to give it its uses in the house: the common modern name, needs its leaves bay tree is strongly scented (when crushed) and the leaf is used in cookery. Through rosé-coloured glasses . . .

Pink wines are frivolous, fun and slightly decadent. It seems to me that actresses' slippers could have been filled with nothing but pink champagne and that the picnickers in Manet's "Dejeuner sur l'herbe" must have been drinking vin rosc. Perhaps it's because we've had too many summer holidays that have floated by in a pink haze that we find it hard to take these wines seriously. Nevertheless, it is true that finding a good vin rose is extraordinarily difficult. Whereas I find it relatively easy to track down hundreds of excellent white and red wines every year, I feel I've done well if I manage to come up with a handful of reasonable

It may be just that pink wines are no longer the fashionable tipple they were 10 or 15 years ago, but I think the real reason is a more fundamental onc. The problem with pink wines is that they are neither one thing nor the other. They often lack both the clean cut refreshing crispness of white wines and the depth, fruit and flavour of red wines. In order to acquire their attractive hue, most roses are vinified quickly, with the must kept in contact with the skins this rose introduced wine to a lot of new drinkers and provided useful stepping stones between beer and spirit and wine drinking.

Pink wines are above all perfect picnic and outdoor wines for occasions when all that one really wants is some-thing cool and uncomplicated that can be knocked back without bothering too much about vintages or vinosity. The problem is usually price, since n my experience a decent rosé around the £2 mark is well nigh impossible to to find.

Last year, however, I was pleasantly surprised when Paul Masson's litre bottle of Califor-Masson's litre bottle of California Rose Wine came top by a very long way in a High Street rose tasting I had organized. Having tasted it again recently, I am happy to say it is still as Gerard Harris. 2 Green End Street Aston Clinton Bushing I am happy to say it is still as pleasant. So if you have always determinedly paused by the carafe shelf in your local offto thank rose for - especially overcome your prejudices and that big Portuguese brand flip open the lid of this grapy, Mateus Rose. Although no one medium sweet rose. Its fruitycould put possibly put Mateus flowery character is unusually in the first league, and although its sales in this country are dropping now, in its heyday, about £3.35 from most off-licenses. In fact the only drawback I can think of is its amazingly lurid colour which must be one of the most non wine-like I have ever seen.

France, as usual, is one of the best sources of roses. But while I have enjoyed many refreshing Provence rosés on holiday in the South and Rosé and Cabernet d'Anjou wines wandering along the Loire, regretably none of these wines has tasted half as good as back home. One vin rosé capable of making the journey, however and to my mind the finest rose France produces is the Rhône's Tavel. What unspeakable dangers lurk behind these garish covers?

With his back to the wall and his upper lip stiff, Ion Trewin relives boyhood thrills

There's a climax in Dornford Yates's first adventure story.

Blind Corner, when Jonah Blind Corner, when Jonah Buildog Drummond by Sapper Mansel and co are trapped in an underground chamber with the The Mind of Mr J. G. Reeder by Wagensburg treasure: their tunnel has caved in behind them; the other way out is barred; and if they do break into a secret passage that leads to a 90st deep well, will the water level be low enough to allow their escape?

I defy the reader with any imagination to dog-ear the page, put out the light and sleep easily until the morrow before greed-ily reading on for the solution. Rereading Blind Corner and these other "Classic Thrillers" in Dent's new series a link soon emerges: each is indeed a pageturner, or, as Tom Sharpe puts it in his introduction to Blind

Corner, "a rattling good yarn".

The plot of Bulldog Drummond (originally published in 1920) may be absurd, with the demobilized Captain Drummond doing battle with archeriminal Carl Peterson massured as a Belshorik was querading as a Bolshevik, but I still find myself echoing Sharpe on Blind Corner: "I have no idea how many times I have read it, but I still find it enthralling."

With Buchan I have to try harder. Castle Gay (written in 1930) has its moments, but I prefer the five Richard Hannay "shockers", as Buchan called them. Castle Gay begins with too much whimsy and only gets going when Jaikie and Dougal become involved in a complicated plot to project the cated plot to protect the humourless and pompons news-paper proprietor. Thomas Car-lyle Craw. Then Buchan's talent for description takes over, with even a touch of innocent sex in the person of the delicious Alison Westwater.

For me the revelation of this quartet is Edgar Wallace's The Mind of Mr J. G. Reeder. By the time these stories of the omniscient clerk at the public prosecutor's office were published in 1925 Wallace was in decline. He could write a fulllength thriller in a night – and it showed. But I had forgotten that Mr Reeder was an exception in Wallace's final years, with twists in the stories rivalling those of Roald Dahl.

It is a mark of these stylishly produced reissues that the introductions add considerably to the pleasure. Only since A. J. Smithers's biography last year has the strange story of Dornford Yates's retreat into colonial recluseness become fully apparent, but Tom Sharpe has done further research and here

Julian Symons, who intro-duces Mr Reeder, remarks that read her. So in three months she Julian Symons, who intro-Wallace showed none of the antisemitism that mars Sapper and Buchan - a charge vigo-

But it is Richard Usborne to whom we owe the phrase "clubland Heroes" which identifies this era of adventure writing - who, to my mind, hits the bullseye. Introducing Bull-dog Drummond he recalls: "I wolfed his books first at an age when I wanted to be taught: how to shoot the pip out of an age of dismonds. ace of diamonds at twenty paces; how to mix a Martini cocktail; how to twist a poker into knots; how to survive when, doped rigid by villains, I was put at the wheel of my Rolls and sent over the weir doubt. New readers, raised on Forsyth, Bagley or Maclean, start here.

Daunting memoirs of a harridan of virtue 'A readable feast

Harriet Martineau - the name itself is slightly forbidding, and forbidding in many ways the owner of it must have been, according to nineteenth-century testimony. Reading period memoirs, one has the impression that Harriet Martineau (1802-1876) was not easy to escape from, a feeling which her remarkable autobiography - all 1.000 pages - reinforces.

She is clearly impossible to ignore. No one interested in nineteenth-century social and biographical history can fail to come across her, and Virago, yet again, is to be wholly congratulated on making available to a wider public what is a vivid, if often opinionated, kalcidoscopic view of the political and literary life which Harriet records with near total recall and with such devastating

Driven to the peak of inspiration by duty, Harriet, in her 53rd year diagnosed as a dying woman, decided that life as she had known it and intellectualized about should be set down for posterity. had made her will, arranged her litérary papers and issued strong instructions for all her letters to be destroyed (letters she considered written conversation, and conversation she deemed private). Whereas her immense volume of published work fiction, political works, essays remains neglected and in the main rightly so, this autobiography is a great classic. It has power and drive which insist on being noticed. It records events, issues and personality sketches which all contribute invaluable addenda to biographers and

Harriet was a very busy social creature, all the more remarkable in that she was deaf and used an ear trumpet, and the celebrities who run through her pages form a roll-call of the century's famous men' and women - the Carlyles, Wordsworth, Rogers, the Brownings, Charlotte Bronte, John Stuart Elizabeth Fry. Robert Owen, the list is never-ending. As a political activist, with radical sympathies, Harriet, rational and anti-slavery, consulted by Westminster, took part in every social debate of her day and lived through many historical milestones - the aftermath of Waterloo, Victoria's coronation, the Reform Bill, the new Poor Law, to mention but a few. She was unfailingly interested in what was happening in her world, and her memory (aided by her diaries) is speciacularly selec-tive. She had a nose for news and people who influenced

The sixth of eight children in liberal Unitarian Norwich family, she enjoyed the comforts and privileges of a prosperous middle-class background. While one admires her incredible willpower and commends her forthrightness about education, social equality and women's rights, one backs away a bit from Harriet. She is solemn beyond endurance, humourless, intensely critical of all weakness in others, a classic example of the wrong person saying the right thing. She barks at one; easy to imagine how frivolous she would make one in self-defence. Proud that she had "emancipated" herself "from all superstition", she would brook no frailty in the next person, and some of her judgments are very harsh.

She predicted world wars in the 20th century, foresaw "the scientific knowledge of human nature". One cannot fault her on principle. Her autobiography demands to be read, Harriet herself would insist we have a brought her success and finan-duty to listen to her right to the cial security. Decorum, doubts and deceit

The Reef by Edith Wharton oman Fever by Edith Wharton (Virago, £3.50)

"Nothing is more perplexing to man than the mental process o a woman who reasons he emotions", says Edith Wharton and nothing, it becomes clear was more fascinating to her Like her friend Henry James she was an American who spen a lot of her life in Europe, and like him, she was interested in the patterns of behaviour or schemes of moral judgment which are sometimes set up as concealments or expressions of powerful emotion.

In The Reef, first published in 1912, she contrasts two types of feminine sensibility in two contrasting women. Anna is a young American widow living in a beautiful French château. She seems, at first, an ca-pression of the highest aspirations of sheltered womanhood. In her daily family life and her dealings with mother-in-law and stepson she never falters but when she falls in love and prepares to marry again she is suddenly vulnerable. Because she canot break out of the reticence she has developed she involves herself in convoluted doubts and misunderstandings about the man she loves.

Sophie is her counterpart. Her life has not been sheltered or secure, it has needed frequent reorganization and patching up. so the need for choice has kept alive her spontaneity and enthusiasm for life. Unlike Anna she is free to experience profound sexual love without analysing its context. Yet she is not the heroine. The author's real interest lies with Anna.

Many of the stories collected together in Roman Fever have similar themes. A woman runs away from her marriage and feels she is striking a blow against the rigid convention of marriage, but she finds she is not. In order to live peacefully with another man she must either be married to him or pretend to be, and this realizathing that we have on this side of the great green Bouillabaisse to M. F. K. Fisher. That is to tion, which she can never fully discuss with him, lies between them, straining their relation-

Some of the ideas satirized here have now changed, but any social convention puts a restraint on behaviour and it is the restraint which interests Edith Wharton. By careful writing she will point out what is not said in a conversation. and often suggests a relationship by describing the quality of writes around them with learna silence. The dramatic moment ing and wit that are rarely is always the moment of devoted to such a banausic concealment when good mansubject as stuffing food down ners and deceit indistinguishable.

Women's wiles unmask male vanities

The Jacobean playwright John Marston makes a rare appearance on the London stage next week. The National Theatre are reviving The Favn, a little-known comedy using a large number of characters to investigate the balance of power (and understanding) between the sexes, much to the men's

Born in 1576, Marston wrote all his plays in his twenties before cutting off his career and going into the Church. The Malcontent is rich in his typical vein of exoberantly snarling satire: The Dutch Courtesan is a disturbing tragi-comedy with an hilarious sub-plot. The Fawn is a fawning flatterer at the court of Urbino. No ordinary flatterer, though: he is Hercules, the Duke of nearby Ferrara, come in disguise to watch his son, whom he has sent to Urbino as ambassador. Urbino's follies and vices tempt him to play first the cynical observer and then the manipulator, buttering up and encouraging the lecher, the adulterer, the jealous impotent husband, the conceited Duke of Urbino himself, until the time comes to humiliate them at the hands of the women they have underestimated. The victims characters are drawn with humorous gusto and the moral for men is clear.

The director, Giles Block, suspects that The Fawn may mark a crisis in Marston's personal life. "I think he had a great problem with sex as a young man in that carious period at the beginning of the seventeenth century - The Fawn

The film appeared in 1945, the year of victory in the Second World War which the United States had done so much to make possible, but at the cost of a tremendous social dislocation as men left families for the battlefields of Europe and Asia.

If not directly related to that, The Lost Weekend can be seen as reflecting the anxiety in the country at the time, an anxiety faithfully echoed by Hollywood, whether in socalled problem pictures or in the moral ambiguities of the

CAMBRIDGE FILM FESTIVAL Arts Cinema, Market Passage, Cambridge (0223 352001). Until

July 24. Starting tomorrow, the seventh festival offers a welcome mixed bag of quality films just released i London, films just around the comer (Charles Sturridge's Runners, Mon and Tues) and films still in limbo (Bertrand Biler's dotty but compelling Beau Père, Wed and Thurs). Also six fiery, fighting films by India's Mrinal Sen, Including The Royal Hunt and The Man With the Axe (Thurs).

CONFIDENCE (15) Gate, Bloomsbury (837 1177/8482) István Szabó's austere, compelling tale of emotional conflicts be two fugitives posing as a man and wife in Nazi-occupied Hungary; filmed with the same sureness, insight and excellent use of modest resources that marked the director's Mephisto (made two years later).

The nine would succeed if West had started with A Q 5. The knave would produce the extra trick if West had A 10 5. The solution lies in West's failure to switch to a club at trick two. This almost certainly places East with a top club, which leaves West, if he did not hold the VQ with insufficient points to justify his opening bid.

open defences and there are two basic reasons for this. One is that, despite its antiquity (it was already popular in Tudor days and one can well imagine Henry VIII employing it to while away his welding night with Anne of Cleves), it has about it a highly modern flavour. There is a certain piquancy about this paradox which I find unfailingly attractive.

But, more important than this is the undoubted fact that the Sicilian is not just a defence, it is a counter-attack and is always used as such by the world's best players. Little wonder too that it figures strongly in the ever-increasing flood of books on openings that have threatened to fill my house and drive me out of it in the past 20 years. It almost goes without saving that the most prolific source is Batsford and there are four of their books which I have failed to review before but which all deserve commendation.

The first contains an odd paradox in that it is, at one and the same time, old-fashioned and very modern: Sicilian: Lines with .e5 by T. D. Harding and P. R. Markland (105 pages, paperback, £6.95). 4.,e5 (or in descriptive P-K4) was advocated by Labourdon-

But far and away the best of Q-B3. all these books on the Sicilian is one from a publisher who has announced that he is abandoning the publishing of books on chess: The Najdorf Variation, Sicilian Defence by Yefvin Geller, Svetozar Gligoric, Kavalek and Boris Spassky (originally RHM Press,

Their proposals, worked out over the past week at a conference of a new organiza-tion, Education 2000, also include a legal entitlement to further education and training for all. They say that O levels and CSE examinations should be replaced with new methods of assessing children.

Education 2009, launched last year with the Duke okf argh as its patron, porters before a second conference is held to work out a plan for what education should be like in the year 2000.

The conference, attended by about sixty people from industry and education at Westfield College, London University, included Mr Albert Dodd, personnel and industrial relations manager of Ferranti, Dr John G. Test-tube baby girl makes NHS proud

A little girl weighing 6lb 2uz yesterday became the first test tube baby to be born on the National Health Service for over a year and could be the harbinger of a new programme at the Hammersmith Hospital in London (John Witherow writes).

The girl as yet to be named, was born after a caesarean section on Mrs Elizabeth Hornett, aged 35, who had been trying for 10 years to have a baby.

Although the child is the first test-tube baby to be born at the hospital, Mr Robert Winston, director of the Winston, director of the infertility unit, is planning for up to six women a week to be fertilized who otherwise could not have children. Another baby conceived outside the womb at the hospital is expected in two weeks.

More than one hundred test-tube babies have been born in Britain, almost all of them in two private clinics in London and Cambridge, where hopeful parents pay between £900 and £1,800. The National Health Ser-

Paris has never seen anything quite like it. More than two months after the opening of the Manet exhibition, the queues still continue to curl all day around the Grand Palais to see the first major exhibition of Manet's work for more than half a century.

Apart from a few paintings in museums abroad that never leud their treasures, all Manet's great works are here: more than 200 of them, nearly all painted between 1860, when Manet was 28, and his premature death in 1883 from a disease that affected his ability to coordinate.

More than half a million people — an average of nerly 8,000 a day — have already visited the exhibition, organized jointly by the national museums of France and the New York Metropolitan Museum of Art to mark the centenary of the artist's death. The only other exhibition in Paris that has come near to equalling that record was that devoted to Monet, in 1978.

The Manet exhibition is open seven days a week from open seven days a week from 10 am to 8 pm, extended to 10 pm on Wednesdays. I was advised to go on Wednesday evening as "no one knows it's open then, so it's much quieter". In fact, it is about the worst possible time to go, as everyone has obviously been given the same advice.

The smallest quenes are likely to be found on weekdays at about 5 pm. But do not go then if you are feeling tired: there is a lot to see.

Entrance costs 15 francs (£1.25), reduced to 12 francs on Saturdays, and free, as for all French museums, on Sunday. The 540-page, colourplated catalogue, which is selling 1,000 a day, costs 160 francs (£13.30).

Guided tours are laid on four times a day, to the great inconvenience of those wishing to make their own way round the exhibition, who find their view continually blocked by a great gaggle of people.

Perhaps even more irritating are the self-appointed experts who stand right in front of the paintings, waving their arms around, as they share their expertise with the victim of the shooting incident, Mr Paris Malatii, aged 24, had a bullet hole in the forehead immediately above the

OAU split as Chad war widens

From Godfrey Morrison

As the fighting intensifies between government troops and rebels in Chad, inter-African diplomatic lobbying is splitting the continent into its familar moderate and radical blocs.

A message from President Hissene Habre of Chad was due to be delivered to King Hassan of Morocco yesterday, amid speculation that the Chad Government may be secking Moroccan help in its battle against the forces of the former president Mr Goukouni Oued-

Moroccan officials said they thought it unlikely that Morocco would send troops to help the Chad Government, though Morocco has expressed support for Mr Habre against the rebels, who are believed to be receiving strong support from Libva.

A communique issued here last weekend after talks between King Hassan and Colonel Gaddafi, the Libyan leader, was silent on Chad, even though it was a principal subject during the first talks between the two leaders for more than a decade that, despite Colonel Gaddafi's visit, Morocco and Libya remain at odds on the issue.

Zaire, a leading moderate, in the only African state so far to have sent troops - 250 para troopers - to help Mr Habre, a move strongly criticized by Lieutenant-Colonel Mengistu Haile Mariam, the Ethiopian leader, who is chairman of the Organization of African Unity and a leading radical. Earlier this week Mr Inonga Lokingo Lome, the Zairean Transport Minister, held talks here with Muhammad Boucettas, the Moroccan Foreign Minister, which are believed to have centered on Chad.

That the Chad fighting

should reopen the moderateradical split is hardly surprising, because disagreement about who should represent Chad was a principal cause of the failures last year to hold the annual meeting of the OAU.

Piers Brendon traces unyielding Church attitudes to the influence of the Oxford Movement, 150 years old this month

A High road to Anglican UDI?

The Church of England has always been an infernal muddle. Its liturgy is Catholic, its Articles are Protestant and its clergy runs from High, through Broad to Low. It forbids women to be priests but its head is a woman - who becomes a Presbyterian when she sets foot in Scotland. Its adherents range from permissive trend-setters to Festival-of-Light function Almost anything is allowed in the Church of England - even Christianity.

History, of course, is responsible for all this confusion. After the break with Rome at the Reformation, the established Church had to accommodate a compromise in its beliefs and a nation in its pews. It could only do so in a spirit of uneasy toleration. The ecclesiastical expression of that spirit is still visible. There are Anglican churches as stark as dissenting tabernacles, where dour ministers preach the Word in the fashion of Puritans during the Civil War. And, also within the Church of England's fold, one can attend Mass celebrated by genuflections and the content of the ing priests dressed in copes and chasules, and surrounded by enough candles and images to satisfy the Pope.

Yet "smells and bells" and suchlike were unknown to the Hanoverian Church, even though it was so latitudinarian that Bishop Warburton could delclare: "Orthodoxy is my own doxy; heterodoxy is another man's doxy". For in the perpetual tug-of-war between High perpetual tug-of-war between High and Low the latter was winning. The eighteenth-century Evangelical revival stressed Protestant doctrines, especially salvation by faith, and the Catholic channels of grace, the sacraments, were neglected. In most churches Holy Communion was celebrated only three times a year.

One hundred and fifty years ago, however, an event occurred which however, an event occurred which pulled the Church of England decisively back to Catholicism. On July 14, 1833, a High Church Oxford divine named John Keble, speaking before the assize judges from the pulpit of the University church, denounced "National Apostasy". He condemned the reforming tasy". He condemned the reforming Whig government, which proposed to abolish 10 Irish bishoprics, for laying secular hands on sacred property and thus abandoning Christianity. Keble reasserted the independent authority of the Church, which rested not on state support, but on Christ's commission to St Peter. This had been transmitted from bishop to bishop down the ages and the apostolical down the ages and the apostolical succession bridged the gulf of the Reformation. In other words, Keble argued, the established Church was not the Protestant Church of England, but the Catholic Church in

Even by the standards of the day (when Oxford preachers could be heard extolling the merits of Abraham as a country gentleman) Keble's sermon was hardly an exciting one. Compared to the dramatic popular crusade launched by Wesley a century before, it was arid and academic. Yet it sparked off the greatest religious revival of the nineteenth century. This was the Oxford Movement or Tractarianism (not to be confused with the Evangelical Oxford Group or Buchmanism in the 1930s) which stamped its mark permanently on the Church, and thus on England. How was it that a small clique of donnish parsons, using old-fashioned tracts as their means of propaganda, could achieve such a revolutionary result? A general answer is that the Oxford Movement, which revived elements of beauty and mystery in Anglicanism, drew strength from the prevailing Romantic climate. Hostile to the secularism and rationalism of the enlightenment, alarmed by the French Revolution, alienated by the hideous processes of industrialization, men looked back with nostalgia to the faith, piety and order of the Middle Ages. The Oxford Move-ment was part of the Victorian rage for medievalism, otherwise mani-fested in Disraeli's Young England movement, the Gothic revival, Pre-Raphaelitism, Ruskin's Guild of St

George and so on. A more specific reason for the Oxford Movement's success is to be found in the character and ability of its leaders. Keble, its "true and primary author", was a saintly figure in an age when sanctity was a more palpable force than it is to a generation from whom the sea of faith has largely ebbed. His poetry was as influential in its day as Wordsworth's, though Sydney Smith (who disliked the Tractarians for preferring the earthly candlestick to the heavenly light) unkindly dismissed The Christian Year as "The Sunday Puzzle". Other Tractarian chiefs, notably E. B. Pusey, were men of outstanding intellectual and morai stature.

The genius of the Oxford Move-ment, however, and its preeminent spiritual leader was John Henry Newman. Newman had the imagination of a great artist. His senses were so subtle that the Fellows of Oriel made him choose their wine, though he seldom drank. His mind was worldwide to it we owe the hymn "Lead Kindly Light" and How Punch viewed the Oxford Movement's Catholic tendency, with E B Pusey as the Pope. what is perhaps the finest autobiography in the English language, the Apologia Pro Vita Sua. Newman, intent on achieving "a second Reformation", also wrote the most rigorous and effective tracts. And his sermons were so imbued with the beauty of holiness that, hearing them, many of his contemporaries understood for the first time the religious meaning of what they had been saying all their lives.

Newman's influence was im-mense - it extended even to The Times, which thundered on his behalf. For hundreds of young men, it was said, "Credo in Newmannum" was the genuine symbol of faith. A generation of Oxford undergraduates adopted his views, treasured his hints as oracles, imitated his mode of speech, slumped into their pews as he did, and adopted his long-tailed coat as the badge of the movement. Before long many of them had become devout and high-principled clergymen and were spreading the Tractarian message through the parishes of England.

At first the Church responded favourably to the Oxford Movement. The bishops were pleased to have their spiritual authority magnified, though they were somewhat dubious about Newman's good wishes: "We could not wish them a more blessed termination of their course than the spoiling of their goods and martyrdom. Soon the doubts grew into suspicions that Anglo-Catholicism was leading to though Newman did secode to Rome in 1845 (followed by some disciples, including the future Cardinal Manning), his spiritual impulse had been so strong that it enriched both the Church he left and the Church he joined.

As the Victorian age progressed, the High Church Movement embraced an increasing number of Anglican clergy, many of them in large industrial towns. It prompted the foundation of monetains orders the the founding of monastic orders, the revival of worship, especially its sacramental side, and above all the elaboration of ritual.

came to terms with ritualism, as it had done with so many other apparent anomalies. And by the twentieth century Anglo-Catholics probably constituted the strongest party in the Church of England. They also provided the firmest bulwark against what Newman had forescen as a major new threat to organized religion - "all-corroding, all-dissolving scepticism".

Today it is the High Church

Today it is the High Church brigade who resist joining the Methodists aboard a "celestial omnibus". They prevent the ordination of women. And it is probable that they will lead the way to the inevitable disestablishment of the Church of England. Modern "successors of the Apostles" (as Macaulay irreverently dubbed them) will thus take the Oxford gospel of ecclesiastical independence, which Keble so memorably enunciated a century and a half ago, to its logical century and a half ago, to its logical Roman Catholicism. No longer a law unto themselves

Last year was a distinctly un-comfortable one for the Law Society, the governing body for the country's 42,000 practising solicitors. An increasing number of solicitors' bills were referred to the Society for adjudication as to their reasonableness and more claims were made against solicitors for professional negligence. In addition, a real threat to the profession's monopoly on house conveyancing prompted the Society for the first time in more than five years to prosecute four unqualified conveyancing agents for preparing cut-price transfer docu-

To add to its misery, the Society not only had to fight a rearguard action against banks and trust corporations which are croding the profession's monopoly in probate matters (the right to administer a deceased's estate) but also had to oppose the Lord Chancellor's Department over new legal aid

But while the Society may have had a bad year shoring up its creaking edifice, it showed what it could do when confronted with a badly drafted Bill which offended the profession and the essence of a free democratic society. In its representations to the Government over the Police and Criminal Evidence Bill, it scored a notable first in opposing increased police powers which were not balanced by adequate safeguards for the suspect and the confidentiality of pro-

After yesterday's annual general meeting, it is this dilemma which faces the newly elected president and Council of the Law Society. Is it to be little more than the custodian of restrictive legal practices, tinkering with peripheral legal reforms, or is it to become the powerhouse of a reforming movement dedicated to streamlining a ponderous legal system already bowed under the increasing burden of legal costs? It is becoming clear that if the Law Society does not put its own house in order, others will

The worst problems require real reform and not fine-tuning. At the heart of these lies the ever increasing. cost of going to see a solicitor. This is partly the result of serious shortcomings in the legal system itself but is also caused by straightforward overcharging by some solicitors for services which could be provided for half the cost.

Whereas conveyancing used to be one of the most profitable areas cornered by the profession the really lucrative work for solicitors now lies. in the company/commercial field. Large companies rarely query solicitors' bills and some City solicitors are charging £100 an hour or more for expert advice.

While this may be acceptable to many wealthy corporate clients, largely because legal fees are tax deductible, a charge of £100 an hour or more is light years away from the scale of rates laid down by the Lord Chancellor's Department for criminal legal aid cases or what would be people.

It is in fact the wide divergence between the scale rates allowed by the courts and the hourly rate usually charged for un-contentious business which so often baffles the layman. And it is in the un-conten-tious business field that the Law Society has particular responsibility to check its members' bills when asked. But this is precisely where, to its harshest critics, the Society comes perliously close to outright hypocrisy with its little-known and largely ignored booklet The Expense of Time, a guide on how to work out an hourly charging rate for each solicitor in a partnership. Criticized in 1979 by Mr Justice Goff in R v Wilkinson, and now in its third incarnation, The Expense of Time still perpensions the highly "misleading" idea of "notional salaries" for partners – £15,250 for Central London and £11,450 elsewhere. But these notional salaries, published mouthly in the Law Society Gazette, bear little or no relation to what partners, particularly £100-an-hour partners in the City, actually take bonne, a fact openly admitted by one of the Society's full-time officers.

Moreover, according to the same officer, The Expense of Time is "not meant to be understood by the layman", a statement likely to its third incarnation, The Expense of layman", a statement likely to perpetuate the belief in some quarters that the Society is shrouding its activities in secrecy and behaving little better than some of the more powerful trade unions in protecting its own members' monopoly.

The increasing mease over some solicitors' fees provoked the CBI to hold a one-day conference last month on "Managing legal costs".

Almost without exception the speakers recommended that com-panies with a sufficient volume of egal work, in particular conveyancing, litigation and some specialist fields, should set up their own legal departments.

Apart from scrapping The Expense of Time and devising a simpler and more straightforward guide to solicitors' costs, the Law Society must come to grips with the urgent need to reform certain aspects of civil prodedure. Most notably it must accept that in many cases it is an unnecessary and expensive luxury to have both a burniser and solicitor in court at the same time. This not only leads to a doubling of costs but a barrister accompanied by a junior clerk or the client in person would in many cases be just as affective.

If the Society fails to grasp this nettle and continues to oppose the Lord Chancellor's Department in trying to reduce unnecessary legal costs it will encourage the belief that it is nothing more than the custodian of restrictive practices with nothing better to do than prosecute unqualified conveyancing agents who see themselves as the Freddie Lakers of the legal world. This will hardly elevate the profession in the eyes of right-thinking

Then there was university. The most important event of my first year was calling on a lecturer who was saying goodbye to a student at the end of his academic (if that's the word) career. "Don't worry," kindly old soul said, tapping the side of his nose, "I happen to know that when the Finals results are announced next week, you'll be all right." The lad's face lit up and he strode off happily into the outside world, where a theatrical director-

"You mean," I said, "he's got a "No, no," said the lecturer, "a Third - but he has got a degree."

How pathetic, I thought, that scraping the lowest possible Honours degree was cause for congratulation. At least, I thought that for a time, until my own lack of skill in the examination chamber of horrors became apparent. Realizing that I was not exactly a high flyer, I took the precaution of finding a job before the results of my Finals could spoil my chances. Then I went to take my leave of the lecturer.

"Don't worry," he said, lowering his voice, "you'll be all right." "You mean?" I gasped, "a Third? My very own degree?" He tapped the side of his nose.

As it turned out, I need not have worried. My employer-to-be had spent his first two years at university driving his sports car and inheriting a fortune. His tutor gently suggested that there might not be a third year, so he climbed into his car and drove to London, where he bought himself a magazine to pass the time. On which, much later, I worked.

Not only did my boss refrain from asking about my degree, he was pretty impressed that I had been clever enough to last three whole years at a place of higher learning. Or lower learning, as it was in my even more of his time than mine, he could never quite squeeze super-visors into his schedule and they simply assumed I was on my own.

In the few days before Finals, he took it into his head to accompany me and I introduced him to the surprised academics as "This is Richard - I don't think you've met." He was in turn astounded when I came out with difficult words like "Dickens", "Keats" and - once, when I was really on form - "the Romantics". I was cross when he clocked up the same degree as I did, reckening that if he was worth a Third, I should have been a professor at least.

He came to a bad end, I'm afraid, as a presenter on Channel 4. If only he had stuck to his studies, he could have been an unemployed lecturer like the rest of our contemporaries.

It is, as we discovered, easier to flannel your way to an Arts degree than to a Science. The same is true at both O and A levels, or certainly was the case last year for entrants to the Oxford and Cambridge Board. At O level, 95 per cent offering English Language achieved some sort of pass, as opposed to 88 per cent of science entrants. At A level, approximately twice as many English and Physics candidates made the grade.

Even so, there are those who fall through the bottom of the most generous of nets. In my time there was always some poor soul who writhed around for a bit over his papers and then rushed out. There are cases of candidates experiencing an actual paralysis of the writing arm. (With me it was the brain.) Some make themselves so high on stimulants that they have to be led into the exam room and pointed at the paper, which they answer as best they can, that is, by writing down their own name and nothing but their name for the next three hours. Robert Morley's way of passing the time was to write down the names of the Twelve Apostles ad infinitum. He failed, generally, like the medical student whom a friend of mine observed with the rabbit which candidates were supposed to dissect. Instead, this one proceeded to turn up the Bunsen burner and

After the vindaloo, an evening of video piracy

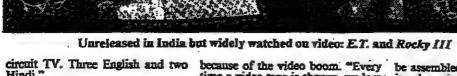

With a grinding of gears, and a spin of the wheels eddying dust around the crowded midnight bus station, the long-distance coach from Karnataka to Bombay pulled in for a passenger "comfort stop". But no one got off.

All the passengers were glued to their seats, watching a television screen above the driver which was showing an Indian film starring heart-throb actor Amitabh Bachan Only when the conductor pulled out the plug and the screen went blank did they scrabble out to stretch their cramped limbs.

As the driver pulled out and the video tape started running again, several bystanders ran alongside to catch a glimpse of the action.

The long-distance video bus is only one manifestation of the extraordinary growth of the video industry in India. Video screens showing the latest films in Hindi, Tamil, Bengali, or any other of the 16 languages covered by the Indian film industry, are popping up as enticements to custom in bars, cases

The industry is also feeling the pressure of an entertainment tax imposed both by state and central government Interest on the money rrowed to finance a film can be as high as 36 per cent.

Film makers blame the government for an inadequate law of copyright which is permitting the wholesale piracy of their product, and blame it also for opening the floodgates to the video machines.

Two years ago a video cassette layer cost more than 50,000 rupees (£3,500). By last year the price had dropped to 30,000 rupees (£2,000), the result first of smuggling to those auxious to be ahead in the status stakes, and, second, because a few companies had started assembling sets from imported parts.

Only four weeks into the life of emphasis on heroic financial the new Government, and already the axe falls on health services and social benefits no wonder that its opponents have: returned to the election theme of a secret manifesto. Only two days before the election. Mr Norman Fowler declared that it was out of the question that a reelected Conservative Government would cut NHS spending: where are those promises now? Unscathed, as a matter of fact, if the small print is consulted. Mr Fowler took care to confine his pledge to cuts in the planned spending laid down in the annual public expenditure White Paper. Mr Lawson is demanding changes in response to evidence that the NHS, and indeed the public sector as a whole, is overrunning the spending limits set for the current year, and to bring the figure back to target.

But this will not pacify either those looking for material to feed a political outcry or those patients who will suffer from the impairment of services that the announcement will lead to - or, since the ways and means behind specific vexations are seldom indentifiable, any patients who suffer delay or inconvenience in a service where these things are not rare, and want someone to blame.

Like all Governments, this one has many audiences to appeal to, and cannot please all them all the time. Its the total, and represent little

So it acts boldly to. impress the City over endemic failures of public-sector targetry that do not immediately threaten its strategy and might in other circumstances have been left to be mopped up by contingency funds. more than a hundredth of NHS spending. Given the general constraints on public spending since 1979, the Government has not dealt harshly with the NHS. No doubt there is scope for savings in some manpower areas and in some inefficient practices. Mr Fowler's own affirmations that no fundamental threat is intended to the NHS (which the evidence suggests is the fairest available provider of health care in hard times) have been ve-

It may be as much as a year before the inspector has reported and the decision - and it is touch and go can result before the 1990s. This finding of the Commons committee which first pointed the finger at Stansted in 1961, that Heathrow and Gatwick would only be able to handle the expected traffic until 1972.

That prediction was wrong only one of innumerable husks of false prophecy scattered along the way. It is easy to ridicule the planning procedures which have let twenty years pass without a decision that would stick. But it has to be admitted that a snappy process of selection would have lumbered us in the years just before the oil price crisis with a giant new airport that we did not need, sited in an area of valuable countryside, at a cost far dwarfing even that of the successive inquiries which have successfully averted that threat.

There must be fathers and the necessity upon us already? In the last few months the Department of Trade and British Airways have yet again scaled down their predictions of traffic levels between now and the end of the century. But all estimates envisage growth, and if Britain is to continue to reap the considerable rewards of being one of the air crossroads of the world, it will have to be provided for. Some choices are pre-empted by failure to make a choice, and a point may come when we may find we have missed our best Slow and costly as it has been, the inquiry seems to have proved an instrument better suited than its predecessors to comparing the multiple choices before it. Often there seems to be a case in planning inquiries for a two-stage process, where the general questions can be got out of the way before the question of where - which rouses the deepest territorial passions is approached. But the authority's enthusiasm is clearly influenced by the fact that Stansted would be capable of expansion up to Heathrow size and far beyond, if permission could be obtained, solving all capacity problems far into the next century. Commitment to the first phase would undoubtedly strengthen the case for the second, and opponents have not unfairly raised the cry of salami tactics.

Heathrow and Gatwick are expanding but in sight of theirlimits, and the controversial fifth terminal at Heathrow could not be built as quickly as the first stage at Stansted. The preference should be for concentrating development at the existing centres where possible. But financial constraints and local opposition make it improbable that a major airport on a wholly new inland site will ever be acceptable, and if traffic continues to grow this gives a kind of inevitability to fuller use of Stansted's existing runway. There is no reason why this should involve a commitment to a second runway (with its huge sacrifices of countryside and public money) in preference to Heathrow Five. It should be possible - and if possible it would be wise - to keep options for the more distant future open, until a second generation has begun to grow up in the noiseshadow of Stansted argumentation. NO CULT - BUT WHAT A PERSONALITY

This week people in China have Mao's left-leaning successor Hua Chinese Communist leaders been digesting the thoughts of Deng Xiaoping, in the form of his Selected Works, 1975-82 Some . twelve million copies of the book have been published: nothing to compare with the last volume of Chairman Mao's Collected Works, which ran to two hundred million copies, but still an immodestly large print order even by Chinese standards. Given his commitment to collective leadership, which he has done a great deal to foster, it is a trifle disillusioning that Deng has seen fit to advertise himself in this way. Admittedly other Chinese leaders have had their Works published in recent years. But these have on the whole been dull chronicles of Communist Party history. Deng's Works, on the other hand, have an immediate bearing on Chinese politics today. They drive home many of the assumptions on which Deng and his supporters work: that Chairman Mao's revolutionary ideals are to be abandoned, but the memory of the man himself preserved; that economic modcrnisation is a desirable end in itself, and is to be achieved with the help of Western aid and expertise; and that Chinese intellectuals should be culti-

Guofeng - now in a state of semi-disgrace, but not without secret sympathisers - for being wrongheaded enough to oppose Deng and his policies in the late 1970s

The Works of Deng thus constitute a sort of doctrinal ABC, and one on which the official Chinese press has heaped indecently fulsome praise. For the past few years Deng has shown a courageous determination to rid China of the twin scourges of dictatorship and personality cult. But in this instance there are disturbing echoes of the last years of Chairman Mao, when his writings were treated as an infallible guide to right thinking, and as a talisman for warding off wrong

Deng himself must have realized this, but pressed ahead for reasons of his own. One consideration must almost certainly have been the rectification movement, or purge, on which the Chinese Communist Party recently embarked. The movement is designed to bring Party membership - now numbering some forty million - into line with the prevailing political orthodoxy, cleansing it of corbureaucratism and ruption, dissent.

Deng's problem is one that has clude an attack on Chairman been faced by a succession of since the 1940s; how to make such a campaign work. When political purges were in the hands of Maoists during the Cultural Revolution, more than decade ago, the Party's chief instruments were coercion and fear. As his Selected Works bear out. Deng has turned his back on practices of this kind - in theory at least. The alternative he favours is political persuasion reinforced by the threat of disciplinary sanctions. For this reason he must hope that his Selected Works prove to be - as the People's Daily put it recently -the "sharp ideological weapon" with which to "improve the Party's work style".

The trouble is that most Party cadres in China are no longer amenable to political persuasion. Ideologically the Party is exhausted and disillusioned, much like its Soviet and East European counterparts. The only way to reawaken its energies would be to conduct a fundamental review of its nature and purpose, something a first-generation Communist like Deng Xiaoping could never dream of doing Consequently the rectification movement will be a tame affair, and Deng's Works will end up like the Works of other Party leaders, gathering dust on a shelf - a handy form of political insurance, but scarcely a source of inspiration.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

Protest at curbs on town halls

Sir, The new Tory Government has wasted no time in intensifying its attacks on the foundations of local democracy. Yesterday's edict from Patrick Jenkin (report, July 6) confirmed that the Government will again be taking rate-support grant from the urban areas of greatest need and redistributing it to the

Since 1979 ministers have taken £1.7bn from London ratepayes. London's share of the national cake has dwindled from 17 per cent to under 14 per cent. This inevitably threatens the ability of councils to deliver services to those in greatest need and has led to unacceptably high rate rises across London.

The Government's actions amount to a sustained attack on local democracy across the country. Labour-controlled authorities are the prime targets, but those under Tory control will be equally worried by the long-term implications. This is recognised by the Conservative-controlled Association of District Councils. At their recent conference they condemned the Government's plans for "rate-capping" legislation. Local politicians and local authority associations will unite in raising three principal objections. First, the Government is perpetrating a confidence trick on the people of this country. By its own cuts it forces rates up. Then, by shoddy rhetoric, it condemns the rises and uses them to justify unprecedented constraints on local government. If the Government controls the local purse it destroys the power of local authorities.

Tories say they are committed to limiting the role of government, but in fact are increasing and centralising power as never before. They are riding rough-shod over the only

From the Chairman of the Associ-other elected institutions we enjoy in this country. They are disfranchisethis country. They are disfranchiseing local people who have a real understanding of local needs and priorities. Why shouldn't local people determine local services? It is dangerous and arrogant of Mrs Thatcher and Mr Jenkin to destroy a system of local government that has been an integral part of our democracy since the fourteenth century. Second, the very authorities that have lost most grant are those that, on the Department of the Environment's own figures extracted from the 1981 census, have the greatest need in terms of multiple depri-vation. The Government's targets are quite unrealistic and, as Patrick Jenkin was forced to admit yesterday, have even been distorted by elementary arithmetical and computer errors. The truth is that they are politically motivated, for Mrs Thatcher will not tolerate oppo-

Third, it is ironic that on the very day that Patrick Jenkin announced his "penalties", it was revealed that the Government itself is quite incapable of meeting its own targets. In the mumbo-jumbo of moneta-rism, money supply, sterling M3. has risen at 16 per cent over the last year, when the Government were aiming for 7 per cent.

Local authority expenditure for 1983-84 is currently only 3.8 per cent over the Government's unrealistic targets. Perhaps the Govern-ment should be looking to the local authorities to learn how to provide essential services efficiently and cost-effectively.

From the Director General of the Bus & Coach Council

Sir, Mr Dencer, in his letter (July 5) on coach safety, bases his argument on the agricultural tractor which, by the nature of its design and work, is extremely vulnerable to roll-over accidents. The British coach, by contrast, is the most stable vehicle on the roads. Each new vehicle is submitted to a rigorous tilt test by the Department of Transport engin-eers, as a result of which it is 10 times less likely to overnira than any other vehicle. Government statistics for the last five years actually show 13.6:1 in its favour.

The suggestion that roll-over accidents are responsible for paraplegic conditions is therefore - not only in theory but in practice - of little relevance to coach passengers, It is also irrelevant to Mr Dencer's own work as a plastic surgeon because the unfortuntate accidents relate to coaches and not to cars. even though they count as roll-over accidents, are not related to body strength.

A coach which skids on its side and there has been one such accident this year - does not suffer from the collapse of structural pillars. It is therefore difficult to see the relevance of the point which Mr Dencer is making. However, it is

Locked churches

From the Chairman of the Council for the Care of Churches

Sir, Following recent correspondence which reflects the sadness that many people feel when they find a church locked, my sympathies are entirely with them. It would indeed be a black day for England if the locking of our churches, except when services are taking place, were to become general.

Nevertheless, facts have to be faced. The Ecclesiastical Insurance Office reports that approximately 4,000 churches a year have claims for theft or vandalism. This represents about one in four of the parish churches of England.

There is no easy answer to the problem and each parish needs to examine carefully what steps it ought to take. Many have highly organised schemes of "church watchers"; others a system of "key holders" and notices are posted to that effect. Some solve the problem

Orchid survival

From Mr P. R. Butcher

Sir, I was interested to read your Science Report on June 28 in which Hugh Clayton described the efforts being made to preserve wild orchids on the Thames Valley chalks. As he says, it is accepted by the botanists concerned that these dwindling populations are probably doomed and that the most that can be done is to try to prevent their demise being hastened by direct human interference. However, species which are of marginal viability in an environment cannot hope to survive once the population has fallen below a self-perpetuating level.

Particularly is this so if the species in question are dependent upon a fungal saprophyte, as in the case of many wild orchids. Thus the only preservation is to recreate artificially a friendly environment and this can only be done in a farming and other human activities. Of course they do and always have done. The sensible botanist or naturalist will not advocate the segregation of substantial areas of useful land from human influences, the total extermination of wild rabbits or any other extreme and unrealistic measures in order to perpetuate a species which, in evolutionary terms, has had its day in that environment. Consequently it may be more constructive to expend efforts on establishing viable specimen popu-lations of such species in protected habitats rather than try to keep a constant guard on the few survivors in fields and commons. Yours sincerely.

Prospects of a Labour daily paper

From Lord McCarthy

Sir, In The Doctor's Dilemma Shaw introduces a "Newspaper Man" who is "disabled for ordinary business pursuits by a congenital erroneousness which renders him incapable of describing accurately anything he sees, or understanding or reporting accurately anything he hears." May I be allowed to nominate Bernard Levin for the Shaw Award of the

His account of our feasibility study for a new Labour newspaper (The Times, July 4) must surely qualify him for this prize. To take but a few points at random: the figure of 300,000 was based on a market-research survey undertaken by an independent agency with unrivalled experience in this field. It was not worked out by me. The prospect of "breaking even" at this figure arises from the fact we propose that the new paper would not be printed in Fleet Street and would make the most effective use of the latest technology.

Far from suggesting that its editor would be required to "follow unswervingly the political line of the labour movement" the report makes it clear that he should "certainly not shrink from criticism of the movement's institutions or policies - as well as those of the business world and the political parties."

The suggestion that the editor would have to answer to the general secretaries of the TUC and the Labour Party" is quite without foundation. Chapter six makes it evident that their role would be to provide a further safeguard against interference by other members of

Indeed, the very notion of a trust, which finds no place in Mr Levin's account of things, is designed to protect editorial independence and is modelled on the example of The Guardian. This was the device which successfully preserved the independence of the editor of The Observer, until 1976. It also safeguarded the position of the editor of The Times, until 1967. It is advanced because it it thought to offer "the greatest degree of editorial freedom and the best opportunity for establishing a newspaper whose policies and character best withstand the changing times."

Thus if a new Labour daily were established on the lines suggested, its editor and staff would have more freedom from day-to-day pressure and the threat of sudden dismissal than any in Fleet Street - I cannot speak for the position of freclance comic columnists.

Of course there are reasonable grounds on which to doubt whether the proposals advanced are feasible. We assume that "commercial considerations would outweigh any reluctance on the part of advertisers to advertise in a Labour paper based on prejudice or political bias." Mr Levin may well wish to argue that he ows them better tha thinks they are much more bigoted than we assume.

More importantly, it is made clear

Identity problem From Mr Michael Cooke

Sir, One may extend the good point made in Mr Stephen Walker's letter (June 30). Far from deploring public transport tickets and cards with a photograph of the holder as oppressive to the individual, I have long felt aggrieved that our free and democratic society offers me no satisfactory and explicit official means of identifying myself.

l do not drive a car (a greater shame in our warped scale of values than illiteracy), so have no licence. I detest credit cards, I loathe travel (so do not have a passport), my birth certificate can be obtained by anyone willing to pay the exorbitant fee at the General Register Office. and I have no pension or social security book. All I can produce, at best, is my cheque book, medical card, or National Savings Bank book, all of which also contain irrelevant private information.

I contend that we all have a civil right to proper evidence of our dentity and should be entitled to a free official identity card upon demand, complete with photograph. I await with interest the reaction of the civil rights experts to my enlightened suggestion. Yours faithfully. MICHAEL COOKE. 18 Dudley Court,

Feet on the ground

From Sir Peter Masefield

Sir, Not only in The Times (July 2) but also in a presidential pronouncement in the USA, reference has been made to the two hundredth anniversary of the Montgolfier brothers' first flight".

Certainly the Montgolfier brothers (Joseph and Etienne), paper manufacturers of Annonay, constructed the hot-air balloon used for the first successful manned and unrestrained flight nearly 200 years ago on November 21, 1783. But the intrepid aeronauts" were not the Montgolfier brothers but Francois Pilatre de Rozier and the Marquis d'Arlandes. They ascended in their Montgolfier balloon of 79,000 cu ft, made from cotton-cloth and paper, from the Château la Muette (the residence of the Dauphin in the Bois de Boulogne, Paris) and flew downwind 8.2 km (5.1 miles) to alight at the butte-aux-Cailles, near the Place d'Italie, 25 minutes later. The Montgolfier brothers were early, but not the first, aspiring aircraft constructors and the first to go into production. But they never themseives left the ground. Yours faithfully, PETER G. that "start-up costs" of £6.7m will need to be found before any revenue from sales and advertising can be expected. This is the real and substantial barrier to any effective breach in the present Fleet Street carrie.

Mr Levin could well take the view that the Labour movement would be unwise to risk a sum of this size, given its existing obligations, modest means and the hostile environ-ment in which it now struggles to survive. He might go on to argue that in his opinion no outside body or individual would be prepared to help it out on terms that would be compatible with the broad aims and objectives of the paper,

But this is merely to say that we cannot have a paper as broadly committed to Labour as The Times is to the Tories - even if it would not require the same thumping annual deficit and could well make money in the not-too-distant future. This seems to some of us to be a trifle unfair, and no great advertisement for the so-called "freedom of the

Yours faithfully, McCARTHY, Nuffield College, Oxford.

From Mr Nicholas Palmer Sir. Bernard Levin (July 4) trots out the ancient legend that the Daily Herald failed because of an inability to attract readers. In fact, even at the end, its circulation of 1,200,000 was substantially in excess of The Times and Guardian combined (then or now). The problem, which leads directly to the 7-1 imbalance against Labour in the daily press today, is that advertisers are not very interested in most of the people who read Labour papers and most newspapers depend heavily on advertising.

Democracy requires not only freedom to vote but also exposure through the press to a wide range of opinions. The Swedes recognise this and transfer revenue from an advertising levy to the less favoured

Clerical habits

From Ms Angela Wheateroft Sir, The report (June 30) of the Bath and Wells diocese making use of management consultants to reorder the work habits of clergy is at least a step in the right direction, albeit rather late in the day. Would it not be far better to amend the curricula of theological colleges so that the end product, while obviously theological, would have some real management know-how? Why are the clergy overworked when the lay membership of the C of E, potentially a vast resource, is so grossly under-employed? is it not because clergymen have been inade-quately trained to manage the resources already available to them? Lay people may be uninterested or just downright lazy; they may also be embarrassed that management techniques which they apply readily to earn their daily bread in the world are, by and large, viewed with suspicion and regarded as inappropriate in the spiritual realm. Let us have more clerical members of the British Institute of Management. Yours faithfully.

One reaction was to regard separate church with customs what Newman said as "impracation and practices of its own...and further, introduce a system liable to change according to the opinions of individual bishops in succession. Rather than take up the challenge of the Tractarians the problem was handed over to Convocation and

Synod. But the point was made by Newman that, unlike bishops, Convocation would not be "a real and existing power". If one wants the local church to live then the bishop must exercise real authority in his diocese; one cannot be like King Lear and retain power, while handing it over. It is that dilemma which faces both Anglicanism and Roman Catholicism in the concept of synodical government and episcopal com-missions. On the one hand, there is a desire to stress the pastoral dimension, on the other an unwillingness to accept the consequences. But in opting for the central processing unit. which allows for episcopal noises instead of the bishop as the centre of unity, are we not getting the worst of both worlds?

OBITUARY MR HERMAN KHAN Thinking the unthinkable

Mr Herman Kahn, who died at his home in Chappaqua, New York, on July 7 at the age of 61, had made a worldwide repu-tation with his thinking on nuclear warfare, his attempts to predict the future, and particularly for the way in which he aimed to put such predictions on a scientific basis.

He first became known for his book On Thermonuclear War, published in 1960, in which he set out to make a dispassionate analysis of the prospects of such a war, and what should be done to minimize the damage. This led to attacks from critics, who accused him of thinking about things which should not be thought about, and of conse-quently making the horrors of nuclear war more likely. But he took up this gauntlet with another book, Thinking About the Unthinkable (1962), in which he took his ideas further; and this concept became some-thing of a trademark for him.

In 1961, together with some associates, he founded the Hudson Institute in Croton-on-Hudson, New York, of which he became the director. The institute aimed to provide reasoned predictions of trends in world affairs, which would be reliable enough to be the basis for planning by governments and private institutions. He himself published books on a wide range of subjects, from the future of Japan to the prospects for world economic

Perhaps the most striking feature of these works was that he set himself against prediction of doom. He consistently took the view that in spite of forecasts by environmentalists, and others that mankind would use up the available natural resources and make the world nninhabitable, ingenuity and technology would in fact find ways of avoiding this and improving the quality of life.

He himself was a large, ebullient man who revelled in ideas and argument, who worked incessantly, and whose conversation was a constant flow of new thoughts. In the long run his contribution lay, not so much in the accuracy of his predictions, but in the fact that he forced people to try to make them, and to reexamine preconceptions.

Kahn was born in Bayonne, New Jersey, on February 15, 1922, but grew up in Los Angeles. During the Second World War he served in the army as a telephone linesman. He received degrees from the University of California at Los Angeles and the California Institute of Technology before beginning work as a mathema-tician and physicist.

In 1947 he joined the Rand Corporation as a laboratory analyst, and became fascinated by the problems being worked on there. From 1948 to 1961 he was continuously employed there as a senior physicist and military analyst. He developed systems analysis, and then Hudson Institute became one of worked on early and influential studies for government agencies influential "think tanks" in the on the air force, on nuclear United States, receiving large strategy, and on civil defence.

Kahn set out from the premise that nuclear weapons, once invented, were here to stay, and that nuclear warfare was not only a possibility, but a probability. This being so, it was necessary to prepare for the worst, but at the same time try attendances to income tax, and the future of Australia. The diversity of these subjects reflected the outlook of Kahn, a man of inexhaustible mental energy who was prepared to turn his mind to any problem.

He is survived by his wife, Jane, and a son and daughter.

to devise ways in which any nuclear exchange could be contained at the lowest possible level. A nuclear war, he argued, need not mean the annihilation of civilization.

Kahn was quite unabashed by the criticisms this provoked, and went on the develop his and went on the develop his views in later books, Thinking About the Unthinkable and On Escalation Metaphors and Scenarios (1965). He even seemed to relish the publicity his books brought him, travelling widely to put forward his views and presenting them in flamboyant style, It was to a great extent because of Kahn and his views that the concept of escalation in a nuclear exchange became publicly known.

In later years Khan and the Hudson Institute broadened their canvas to consider future trends in the world economy as a whole, as well as the prospects for individual countries. Here again Kahn was quite definite in rejecting the view that things were going from bad to worse as a result of the exhaustion of energy resources, pollution, population growth and food shortage.

He argued that this negative view, and the belief that economic growth was wrong stemmed from such factors as a misreading of signs, guilt feelings among affluent liberals. and a failure of nerve on the part of the West. The world, he said, was in the middle of a 400-year period during which it passed from pre-industrial povery to a post-industrial culture of affluence; and population growth would taper off.

"I'm not saying", he told an interviewer, "that there won't be shortages of some things, that we won't have to make changes, and that there won't be problems. I'm saying that with reasonably good management, the world can get through without catastrophe

In 1967 he published, with Anthony Wiener, The Year 2000, setting out his optimistic views, and in 1979 he followed it up with World Economic Development. Meanwhile the range of his interests had been shown by such other books as Can We Win in Viet Nam? (1968), Why ABM? (1969), and The Emerging Japanese Superstate - Challenge and Response

Under Kahn's leadership, the the best known and most sums of money in grants and One of the fruits of this was government contracts, and On Thermonuclear War, a title taking on such issues as how to chosen deliberately for its win a war in El Salvador. echoes of Clausewitz. Bombing Hampstead

The Offshore Island Old Red Lion

Arguments supporting the "vi-able option" of nuclear warfare are apt to offer an idyllic picture of rural survivors recreating merrie England as a prelude to getting the old country back on its feet. That argument has been going strong since the 1950s when Marghanita Laski's play first appeared and one justifi-cation for this revival is that The Offshore Island puts it through the political crunchers. The first act offers a reassuring post-nuclear pastoral. Rachel and her two children have survived the strike in their West Country farmhouse, and struggled along for eight years on a patch of uncontaminated land. Their civilized possessions are wearing out, but they have food, freedom and family life, Peter Davalle not to mention playing snatches of Schubert on penny whistles. Rachel even has a lover who turns up every few months with provisions, and who plans to settle down with her daughter and propagate the race.

However, no sooner have you decided that Miss Laski's theme is the transition from old Hampstead values to the reinvention of peasant society, then the modern world brutally invades the story in the shape of an American airborn platoon who are rounding up survivors

The idea of Europe as a strategic plaything of the superpowers is one element that dates the play. If Russia and America nuke their satellites out of existence while restricting their own exchanges to conven-tional weapons, the way is open to arguing in favour of Trident and cruise to redress the balance; an idea that would surely horrify the totally anti-militarist author. That kind of hindsight is easy

Her por-trait of the invading group under their bellicose Christian captain may conform to the ugly American stereotype, but it takes the country's ethnic history into account, and forecasts the defoliation of Vietnam.

Theatrically, there is a nasty gap between the agit-prop treatment of the Americans and the domestic realism of the family. Jeff Harding succeeds in showing the ruins of a civilized conscience stirring within the indoctrinated Captain. The BBC has been marking the centenary of Kafka's birth with a series of programmes all, it should be noted, safely closeted away on Radio 3. Described as a "celebration" - a ludicrously joyous word to use of such a pessimistic writer the season was centred on a repeat, broadcast on Sunday, of Hanif Kureishi's tense dramatization of The Trial, directed with a wild-cycd, raw-nerved intensity by David Spenser.

Framing The Trial were two new feature programmes about its author. The first of these was The Trials of K (Saturday, Produced by Piers Plowright) a somewhat clinical examination of Kafka's various tribulations, authoritatively if rather too objectively conducted by Patrick Carnegy. LORD DIPLOCK said that the appellant was a shipping company incorporated in Liberia but its head office and business was carried on in Dubai. It was the owner of a cargo vessel, the Al Wahab.

The company sought to litigate in the English commercial courts its claim against the respondent insurers for a constructive total loss of the vessel which was insured under a hull and machinery policy of insurance against marine and war risks that had been issued in Kuwait by the insurers who had their head office there and branch offices here in the Gulf but had no office or representative in England.

The policy was on the insurers' standard printed form of policy and was in the English language. The wording followed meticulously (with minor and immaterial omissions of references to London) that of the Lloyd's SG policy

In order to pursue its claim in the The company carried out the insurance of its ships through the London office of an English company that was a member of the Rasheed Group. As brokers for that purpose it used I. H. Minet & Co. Ltd (Minets) who also acted as re-insurance brokers for the insurers.

Premiums were paid to Minets in London, policies were issued by the London, policies were issued by the insurers in Knwait and sent on by them to Miners who passed them on in London to the English company. Claims, though expressed by the policies to be psyable in Knwait, were in practice settled in running accounts in sterling in London between Miners and the insurers and between Miners and the insurers and between Minets and the

In these days of modern methods of communication where so frequently negotiated by felex, whether what turned out to be the final offer was accepted in the country where one telex was situated or in the one tries was situated of it the country where the other telex was installed was so often a mere matter of chance. In the result the lex loci contractus had lost much of its significance in determining what was the proper law of the contract.

The crucial surrounding circumstance was that it was common ground between the expert witnesses on Kuwaiti law that at the time the policy was entered into there was no policy was entered into there was no indigenous law of marine insurance in Knwait. A commercial code existed in Knwait dealing with commercial contracts but not specifically with contracts of marine insurance.

The legal effect of the obsolete inguage of the Lloyd's SG policy was discoverable only by reference to the Marine Insurance Act 1906. But that statute was directed to determining what were the mutualnights and obligations of parties to a contract of marine insurance, whether the clauses were in the obsolete language of the Lloyd's SG policy or whether they were in the up-to-date language of the Institute War and Strike Clauses that were attached to the policy.

Except by reference to the English statute and to judicial exegesis of the code that it enacted it was not possible to interpret the policy or to determine what those mutual legal rights and obligations were. So, applying English rules of coullict of laws, the proper law of the contract

The jurisdiction exercised by an English court over a foreign corporation which had so place of business in this country was an exorbitant jurisdiction. Insurers used specious defence

The defendant applied to the judge to set aside the registrar's award. That application was heard at the same time as that in the other case, and there was no significant difference between the two cases. The plaintiffs employed a solicitor throughout to conduct their cases, and in each case the effective defendant was an insurance company.

The first question was whether it was unreasonable conduct on the part of the defendant for the part of the defendant for me purposes of Order 19, rule 1(11) to file a defence admitting negligence but putting damage whofly in issue, thereby putting liability in issue, untwithstanding that the defendant had in fact no defence on liability and no real intention to dispute boardweit and Mrs Plate, from the judgment of Judge Edward Jones on June 18, 1982, at Liverpool County Court, who dismissed their applications to set aside the awards of the registrar in favour of the plaintiffs, liability except as to quantum.

In the county court, where a plaintiff claimed unliquidated damages, if the only issue was the quantum of those damages, the registrar in favour of the plaintiffs, Mrs Newland and Mr MacDonald.
Order 19, rule 1 of the County Court Rules 1936 [now Order 19, rule 6 of the County Court Rules 1981] provides: "(4) Any proceedings to which the sum claimed or amount involved does not exceed £500 shall stand referred for arbitration by the registrar upon the receipt by the court of a defence to the claim..."
(11) No solicitor's charges shall be allowed as between party and party in respect of any proceedings referred to arbitration under Order 19, rule 1(4), except for (a) the costs of enforcing the award; and (c) such usual practice was for the registrar to enter interlocutory judgment for the plaintiff for an amount of damages to be assessed. Upon the reference for assessment each party could adduce evidence and cross chamine his opponent's witnesses.

There was a full opportunity to litigate the question of quantum.

There could be no prejudice to either party on the quantum being sessed in that way instead of being ljudicated in a formal trial. The denial of liability implicit in advantage of Order 19, rule 1(4) and protect the defendants from liability for costs. That device involved a misuse of the pleading process. It speciously purported to raise an issue between the parties which the defendant in neither case genuinely intended to pursue.

It was designed to exclude the plaintiff from the benefit of the summary procedure of interlocutory judgment for damages to be assessed, while at the same time debarring the plaintiff from seeking the exercise of the court's discretion to award costs in his favour occasioned by a specious defence

There were sufficient grounds in each case to justify certificates under Order 19, rule 1(11)(c) to the extent that through the filing of the defences the plaintiffs incurred solicitors charges which they would not otherwise have incurred. The words "to have been incurred through the unreasonable conduct of the opposite party" could not affect any costs incurred before the occurrence of the unreasonable conduct of the defendant.

If either plaintiff incurred further solicitors' charges for services-rendered between the date of the summons and the filing of the defence, those charges would seem to be made unrecoverable by rule I(11).

But what about solicitors' charges incurred after the occurrence of the unreasonable conduct? Either plaintiff after becoming aware that a defence had been filed could have determined the solicitor's retainer charges occurring, but neither plaintiff did so. In those circuns-stances it could not be said that any solicitor's charges accruing there-after had been incurred through the unreasonable conduct of the defendant in filing the defence. The plaintiff had expressly restricted the claim to the limit of the small claims procedure. He must be taken in have known that, if a defence were filed, the case would be automati-cally referred for arbitration, in which event, if he continued to employ a solicitor he would be prohibited from recovering an solicitor's charges from his or-ponent except under Order 19, rule 1(11)(c).

Regina v Neal and Others Before Lord Justice Griffiths. Mr

A person could be guilty of an offence under section 170(2) of the Customs and Excise Management Act 1979, of being concerned in the frauduleut evasion of the prohibition on the importation of cannebis notwithstanding that there was no evidence of his involvement with the actual act of importation.

The Court of Appeal (Criminal Division) dismissed appeals by John Frederick Neal, Michael Phillip Cardwell, Anthony John Cardwell and Salvatore d'Antoni On September 18 the defendant gave notice to the planniff and her solicitors that he had prid £350 into court. On September 22 he filed a defence admitting negligence but not admitting the injuries, loss and damage. The proceedings were automatically referred to grainsting under Order 19, rule 1(4).

On October 20 the plaintiff gave notice of acceptance of the sum paid into court. On November 25 the registrar after hearing solicitors for both parties, gave a certificate in favour of the plaintiff under Order 19, rule 1(11) (c) and ordered that her costs of the action taxed under Scals I should be paid by the against their respective convictions in Swansea Crown Court on April 24, 1982 before Mr Justice Kenneth Jones of an offence contrary to section 170(2) of the 1979 Act.

LORD JUSTICE GRIFFITHS. delivering the judgment of the court, said that this case concerned six hundredweight of cannabis found at the appellant Neal's farmhouse in Wales.

There was no evidence as to where or how the cannabis had been imported, although Neal admitted that he knew it had been imported.

The question was whether the statutory provision was directed only to cases where an accused was part of or connected with the actual smuggling operation, or whether it included cases where the goods came into the possession of the accused who had not been involved with the act of importation as such. The weight of authority was in favour of the latter construction.

The statutory forerunners of section 170 of the Act had been consistently viewed as longstop or catch-all sections: see for example Lord Salmon's judgment in DPP v Doot ([1973] AC 807). Moreover, on

Some cases would be more appropriately dealt with by a charge relating to possession of the goods in question. That dictum was in any event obuer, and in so far as it conflicted with the authorities carrier cited, they were to be preferred. The appeals would be

Howe calls for urgent European action on US steel curbs

By Edward Townsend and John Lawless

Geoffrey Howe, Foreign Sectetary, yesterday called for urgent European Commission discussions on the new United States restrictions on steel imports, a move that has angered governments around the world and soured international trade relations. After a special council meet-ing with other EEC foreign ministers in Brussels, Sir Geoffrey said everyone has accepted the need for urgent action. His remarks came after a varning from Dr Ootto Lambs dorff, the West German Economics Minister of the "un-pleasant political side effects" that would result from the US European Commission trade experts immediately began a detailed analysis of of the restrictions, imposed by the Americans to asist their beleaguered home steel industry and to combat "unfair" import.

The International Monetary Fund yesterday joined the attack on United States fiscal policy. M Jacques de Larosiere, managing director of the IMF

The meeting was arranged after a series of telephone calls had been made to Brussels. Washington, Tokyo and Ottawa by the London-based Trade Policy Research Centre.

Those expected to attend include Mr Paul Channon, the British Minister for Trade, Herr Wilhelm Haferkamp, the EEC's External Affairs Commissioner, Mr Gerald Regan, Canadian Minister for International Trade, and Mr Sosuke Uno, new minister at Japan's Minis-try of International Trade and Industry.

The meeting which Mr William Brock, the US Special Trade Representative, has agreed to attend, is expected to last throughout next Saturday night and possibly continue into Sunday.
The haste with which the need for such a conference has been accepted underlines the concern now felt about the sudden deterioration in international trade relations. The idea was floated two weeks ago, as part of the so-called "quadrilateral talks" agreed at the Ottawa summit in 1981, but it was rejected.

It was numoured yesterday that Viscount Davignon, the EEC's Industry Commissioner, is likely to attend, and so strengthen the EEC's representation - which will put forward Britain's view.

The unusual starting time for the meeting is necessary be-cause Mr Brock was already scheduled to be at Leeds Castle. Kent, where the talks will take

The first booklet in this campaign came last month from the Stock Exchange quotations department whose job is central to the whole system of securities regulation in Britain, though by comparison, this clients' annual report is less glossy and less impressive. But for the publication of both, the Stock Exchange should receive some applause.

Its system of self-regulation has been one, which, by the nature of the way the Exchange is constructed, has been publicity sby.

The Exchange admits that its desire to begin a more open relationship with its "users" – the investors from whom it derives a living - has been prompted by "one or two nasty scares" recently. These have not always been in the Exchange's own back yard, but it appears those in charge are concerued that there may be an "information gap" between the way it really operates and how some "users" think it operates. And it is important it

Hands-on for capital funds

Scarcely a week seems to pass without some new venture capital fund appearing on the scene - each promising something unique and in growing number aiming at backing

Morgan Grenfell, the Prudential and PA Consulting Services are the latest to join forces. Between them they have spawned Managed Technology In-vestors, a limited partner-ship with £6m of funds at present from various institutions and probably at least £2m more to come.

Besides concentrating on a small number of hightech companies, MTI will take a "pro-active" role.
This mhappy piece of American jargon means taking a hands-on approach, involving both a large measure of financial control - possibly a majority stake - and participation in management.

The "pro-active" approach is common in the US but newer in Britain

The entrepreneur with bright ideas is not necessarily good at running a business and, significantly, the high-tech venture capital arm of Investors in Industry (formerly Finance for Industry) has steadily adopted a more hands-on approach. Of course, entrepreneurs are notoriously reluctant to cede control of their businesses and competition to supply funds for promising innovations in the high-tech sector is also intense.

The proof of the pudding wili be the capital gains MTI produces for its investors, of which the largest will be Morgan Grenfell with PAYE There is a greater scope for claiming expenses, particularly travel costs, against your tax as well as the cash flow benefits. And huge chunks of national insurance are not taken from your money.

There is some justice in the Inland Revenue's contention that many self-styled "self-employed" are not genuinely self-employed at all since they have the security of fulltime employment frequently working or only one firm.

The crucial test for anyone in doubt about their position is the relationship between you and the person or organization paying you is a contract "for services", in which case you are self-employed or a contract "of

Avoiding a contract is not necessarily a way out of the problem. For a contract can be unwritten. The Inland Revenue will look at the factors of the case. If you work solely for one organization your claims to be self-employed will probably be

Inland Revenue indicates that the following points will be rather than an employee taxed considered when deciding if a contract is a "contract for service" or a "contract of service."

What is the degree of control exercised by the employer? Does the individual operate in his own time and in his own home or office?

Does the worker own and pay for the maintenance of his own equipment? Does the activity involve financial risk? Does the employer have the exclusive right to the service perhaps in return for a regular flow of work? Any contract that hints of this kind of obligation could be suspect.

Is payment purely by result? Are there any arrangements for paid holidays, medical or

REVENUE

Do you have more than one client" or "employer"? The Inland Revenue has moved first on those groups it believes has evaded tax consistently by not declaring their "self-employed" earnings over the years. In Fleet Street's notorious "Mickey Mouse" newspapers made cash pay-ments to a host of fictional characters - all untraceable. Anyone sweating through O and A levels might be interested to learn that the teachers and lecturers marking their papers were also thought to be among the worst offenders.

There is a danger that many the 2.5 million who are genuinely self-employed could now find themselves swept into the PAYE net. For the Inland Revenue has a 300-strong team investigating companies' PAYE Operations.

Such is the fear and havoc caused by these activities that many employers would rather put everyone onto PAYE rather than risk running foul of the Inland Revenue.

MARVIN

As several employers have found, there are harsh penalties for not deducting tax. The amount you have paid out gross scandal it was revealed that to the self-employed worker is treated by the Inland Revenue as a net payment. The taxman then grosses this payment up to work out how much tax should have been due and demands it not from the individual, but from the company.

One nationalized industry had to pay the Revenue £1.750m back-tax and national insurance contributions as the

No wonder many companies are trying to avoid trouble. But what can you do if you find tax is being deducted at source and feel that you are genuinely self-employed? It is unlikely that you will persuade the company to change its mind it has everything to loose and nothing to gain. The company may ask for a letter from the Inland Revenue confirming your tax position under schedule D. You are most unlikely to get this out from the taxman.

And past returns will probably not be accepted as proof of self-employed status cither. You will have to go through the normal Inland Revenue appeals procedure. Ask the taxman for a formal assessment and then lodge an appeal with the commissioners within the requisite 30 days.

You have the choice of appearing before either the special commissioners in London or the local general commissioners. The former are full time tax lawyers and Inland Revenue officials - the latter are generally local worthies.

If you are a "self-employed" electrician who has been working for a local housebuilder for the last five years, it might not be a good idea to appear before the general commissioners, many of whom will no doubt be aware of this fact.

In either case the only appeal if the decision goes against you is to the High Court, and on points of law only.

Overseas funds dominate table

The London stock market may have reached a peak last month, but for the most part it has been those unit holders who have held their money abroad over the past six months who have seen the best returns.

Only the £3m Henderson Recovery Trust, with about 98 per cent of its portfolio in the Britain denies the overseasinvested funds a clean sweep of the top 20 places in this year's unit trust league table.

Mr Christopher Clarke, one of the investment directors at Henderson Unit Trust Management attributes Henderson's success to searching out genuine recovery situations rather than those shares suffering from just a temporary price setback "Some recovery stocks, such as Pilkington and Turner & Newell, have had a real move in recent weeks."

Prospects in the British stock market are very much influenced by events in the United States. Wall Street touched record levels last month, but stock market indices have dropped on fears of higher United States interest rates,

Mr Jim Mellon, who is responsible for the fortunes of the GT US & General Fund is enthusiastic about the American market.

He points out that "in the three previous bull markets the gains were between 95 per cent and 350 per cent, the duration of the bull markets was between 41h and 71h years. The one that we are now in has been going eleven months and it is up only a baby, with a lot more growing to do." 60 per cent. It is still very much

Several of the funds investing in the United States market recorded some good gains in June. Allied Hambro American Special Situations, Craigmount North American, Mercury American Growth and Target US Special Bond Fund all notched up offer price increases of 10 per cent or more.

However, these rises look mediocre when compared with the performance of the £240,000 Oppenheimer International Growth portfolio. This fund where stock selection is undertaken by Oppenheimer Manage-ment Corporation in New York achieved a 35.4 per cent price jump last month.

Thinking small

Shopping around the smaller building societies is the only way to get the best return for your money. Mornington Building Society of 158 Kentish Town Road, London NWS, is offering 8.5 per cent on its ordinary share accounts with no term restrictions or withdrawal penalties. This is equivalent to 12.4 per cent for basic rate taxpayers.

Picnic perk

New investors with Town & Country Building Society can enjoy the fine weather with a tree pionic set. The sets weather with a free profile set. The sets are being given away to investors who open an ordinary share account with $250 or more, and are available from Town & Country's 70 branches while

Halifax at home

Halifax Building Society is launching a free quarterly family magazine. Homes and Savings, covering all aspects of home life, house maintenance and improvement and personal finance. The magazine, due in September, will trially be posted to 250,000 customers with another 250,000 available at branches and agencies throughout the country. It will be published by Headway Publications. Money show

An exhibition has been launched for anyone interested in money and how to manage it. The Money Show, at the Kensington Exhibition Centre in London from February 2-5 next year will aim to make the individual or the small businessman aware of what products and services are available. Clearing banks, building socie consumer finance organizations, life assurance companies and financial advisers will be brought together to meet their market face-to-face.

Pension relief

How pension mortgages work for the self employed or those without a pension is the subject of a booklet from Sun Alliance. It explains how your mortgage can be limited to a personal pension plan which allows you normal tax relief on your mortgage interest and full tax relief on pension plan premiums.

When the plan axistres, you will get a

When the plan expires, you will get a tax tree sum to pay off the mortgage and an annual pension for your retirement. The leaflet is available from any branch of Sun Alliance or from financial advisers.

Card protection The article last week on the difficulty of stopping chaque cards and credit cards when they have been stolen brought a large response from readers. Card Protection Plan, a company which deals with this eventuality, was among the first with its thoughts on the

For an annual subscription of £8, it will notify banks and credit card companies by telex of any loss or theft of credit cards. When you sign up, a record is taken of the numbers of your credit cards, theque guarantee cards, service till cards and so on. If they are stolen or lost, you make one phone call to Card Protection Plan on a line which is manned round the clock and the company moves into action. You also det $250 worth of insurance cover against traudulent use of the card and useful key recovery services. Details from Card Protection Plan, Tet: 01-938 1041.

Tax relief delay

Homeburgers with a loan of more than 225,000 are being asked to wait for the extra tax relief due on their mortgages. "Where tax relief is due at the higher rates, or the loan is not included in the Miras errangements, appropriate ralief is given in the PAYE code. In these cases the inland Revenue will leave codes functuanged for 1983/84 and check the relief due after the end of the tax year", the Inland Revenue says in a statement. This seems a bit hard on taxpayers since they are already suffering the effects of clawback of the underpayment of tax on mortgages for 1982/83. The Revenue does say, however, that anyone who would prefer to have the code adjusted for 1983/84 should write to the tex office. Applicants will have to obtain tax office. Applicants will have to obtain from their bank or building society an estimate of the total interest likely to be

Rebuilding costs

The cost of rebuilding a house or bungalow rose by 1.3 per cent on average during the second quarter of 1983 and by 7.1 per cent in the 12 months ended June 1983. If the index is applied to a house which would have cost £40,000 to rebuild in June 1982, there would have been an increase of nearly £3,000 by June 1983.

Why so many banks don't really love you

How traumatic, especially for Canadian and Australian banks those seduced by slogans about have joined the exodus.

The decision to withdraw bank, the friendly, neighbour-hood, open-on-Saturdays bank, to discover that your bank manager does not really love you, after all!

Such a discovery was made last month by 200 customers of the London branch of the Banque du Rhone, a Swiss bank now owned by Alexander and Alexander, the US insurance group. They were told, politely but firmly, to go. The decision - which provoked surprisingly little wrath was taken on purely commer-cial grounds. The accounts were not profitable enough, either because the average balance was too low or activity was negligible, in any case, they seemed unlikely to generate much

The Banque du Rhone will not say precisely how much it expects customers to keep in their accounts (£200 qualifies for free banking) but it is not the only bank to insist on a minimum balance.

The Banque Nationale de Paris, with a branch (open to 1 pm on Saturdays) oppostie Harrods, has lately been telling customers about the need to maintain a minimum halance of £100 "at all times". And, unlike the Banque du Rhone, it does not pay interest on current ccounts. Credit Lyonnais, another French bank with three branches in London and one in Edinburgh, is not interested in current accounts of less than

Some foreign banks have branches altogether rather than persist with unprofitable (or not profitable enough) private business. The Americans set the tone when they pulled out of retail banking almost as fast as they moved in.

from retail banking is not an easy one. Accounts may be unprofitable but every bank is obliged to have a certain number of depositors if it is to obtain a licence from the Bank of England. The question is:

The National Commercial Bank of Australia - which has done its share of rationalizing still has 700 private accounts in London, But, over the past two years, it has told hundreds more customers - including many who have banked with it for years "down under" - that they would be better off elsewhere.

So, why do people who could say, enjoy entirely free banking at Williams and Glyn's with only 1p to their name, insist on going - as thousands of Britons do - to a foreign bank? Clearly, the answer has something to do with the fact that the smaller the bank, the more important the

But foreign banks also have snob appeal. This is precisely the factor that prompts winners of the football pools to switch their accounts from the Co-op to Coutts, where the average balance required is £1,000.

Where, then, should one go if the big four banks do not appeal and you can not yet afford Courts? Next to Williams and Glyn's, Co-op, Yorkshire, and Giro bank which impose charges only if an account goes into debit, the best bet is undoubtedly the Hong Kong! and Shanghai. Its services are entirely free.

The drawback, as the big four are quick to point out, is that the Hongkong and Shanghai does not have a branch in Nether Wallop.

Time for writers and commentators to reflect

When Hollywood language can diminish the word and moment

If you saw something described as great, brilliant, into purple prose but next are always "dilemmas", and superb, glorious, breathtaking, awesome, stupendous, marvellous, amazing, unforgettable, magnificent tremendous stupendous st lous, amazing, unforgettable, magnificent, tremendous, stunning devastating and fascinating not to mention fantastic and incredible, what do you think it might be? One of the wonders of the world? A vision of the universe? The birth of a nation? The apocalypse?

If so, you would be wrong, and you can go and stand in a corner for your ignorance. Something far more momentous is being described - I mean Tom's goal and Jerry's try and Tweedledum's century and Tweedledee's return of service. With increasingly indiscriminate and hysterical emphasis, newspapers and commentators have been seeing sport in these terms for years, until the terms have lost meaning and become stock reactions, like a child's grab at a piece of chocolate.

Whenever I read or hear these words now, I recoil instinctively and tell myself, because I have seen and heard them a thousand times before, that in at least 999 cases they cannot be true. I do not object so much to the terms themselves only to their over-use and misuse, to the piling of superlative on top of superlative in accounts of events which in the heat of the more popular moral plane, criticism is a paraphrase of the man in the street's remark, "Pretty, ain't it?" Substitute "Good, ain't it?" and you have a paraphrase of the kind of sporting journalism I am talking bout I would in fact like to see the honourable old word, good, restored to favour; but there is scant chance of that.

It is not good enough for the media. It is not thought exciting enough. It sounds too like damning with faint praise. We are so conditioned to extravagant language in sport that if we see anything described as good we dismiss it with a sniff, telling ourselves that we want no truck with such duliness, and that we expect better from our heroes. Which brings us to the villains without whom there would be no heroes. Things do go wrong in sport, and then a diffenent vocabulary, just as tired, non-concrete and inappropriate, comes into play.

An own-goal in football is "tragic", a dropped catch in cricket "disastrous." Any kind of mistake is liable to be called "appalling" or "horrifying", as if hundreds died as a result. The same words are interchangeable. and can be used on the ever are always "dilemmas", and "concepts" and "imperatives" and "double standards" fill the reader's mind with fog.

While I am at it, I would also like to see the adverb put in its place - out of sight, for preference. Graham Greene has said it is a greater enemy of the writer then the adjective. It is almost always padding "Sadly" and "happily" crop up most often. "Sadly, he broke a leg in a tackle." And later: "Happily, he did not, as was at first feared, break his leg in the tackle." An example of running the gamut of emotion from A to B. One day I shall no longer be able to live because, sadly (or is it happily?), I shall be dead.

When I think of the "unforgettable" sporting occasions that I have completely forgot-ten. I sigh. To me, a goal is a goal and a century a century, no more, probably less. Watching one, I never undergo the mystical experiences that others apparently do. If I did, I would not stand the strain for long.

Breathtaking, magnificent, stupendous, and the rest of the heavyweights ought to be used sparingly, if at all. They are Hollywood words, straight from posters extolling King Kong and Gone With The Wind. They have all the impact now of a

US officials consider their options

FIFA decision over next World Cup may be challenged in court finals to Mexico.

I understand that the USSF have now seen a copy of the original Mexican application submitted by the arbitrary deadline of March 11, and that this document, a mere dozen pages or so, contains no more details or guarantees than the initial American application, the alleged inadequacy of which was said to be the basis of FIFA's rejection of it.

All the comparative data of the two documents, together with details of the charade of FIFA's special meeting in Stockholm on May 20 – at which the US delegation led by Dr Henry Kissinger was cynically and openly humiliated, together with the Canadian delegation, by the invitation to present their case afresh to the FIFA executive committee on an argument now seen to have been already settled long before-hand – have been circulated There are now three possible courses of action. A decision to proceed against FIFA could be taken either by the seven-man executive committee, or by the 19 directors, or by the full USSF council of over 200 members. There is no scheduled meeting of the executive committee, but the council will hold their annual general meeting on August 28.

After the meeting in Stock-holm, at which Joao Havelange, the FIFA president, announced "unanimous" decision to award the finals to Mexico, even though no vote was ever taken, the USSF delegation wanted to see three documents: the Mexican application, which they now have seen; the report FIFA special commission, which inspected only Mexico; and the minutes of that deicisive executive committee meeting of May 20, which rubber-stamped the award to Mexico before the representations of the US and Canada

Officials of the United States that FIFA's refussal to disclose give its reasons. The US, at Soccer Federation are currently the contents of the special divided over whether to take commission's report to one of action against FIFA, either their own member countries within the limited scope of could be overruled in a Swiss FIFA's own regulations, or by court of law. But the question civil law, on the decision to remains whether this could be award the 1986 World Cup achieved in time to be relevant for 1986. A US committee including Dr Kissinger has already dis-cussed the option of resorting tothe civil courts before the departure for Stockholm, but had agreed to wait to see if they received a fair hearing.

Yet now there are two schools of opinion within the USSF. Some officials, led by Werner Fricker, chairman of their World Cup committee, and vice-president of the federation, and Howard Samuels, president of the North American Soccer League, believe that the US should act, not only in protest, against the disgraceful treatment they received in Stockholm, but in the interests of the whole game, worldwide. No other individual or body seems prepared to challenge FIFA's conduct, which at the least, is high-handedly auto-cratic, but more ominously appears consistently to violate democratic procedure and its own constitution. Several members of the executive members of the executive federation are angry at the way committee have admitted that their country has been abused no formal vote was taken, either and consider it should not have to approve the special commission's report or to award the finals to Mexico.

On the other hand, Gene Edwards, president oof the USSF, is of the opinion that it should be accepted that "we lost the game", and that no boats be rocked for fear of jeopardizing even further the USSF's less than powerful position within the clandestine committee ranks of soccer's ruling international body.

Where the USSF has been completely outmanoeuvred up to the moment is in the lack of knowledge among all but a handful of people more used to the world of corporate business, of the complex manoeuvring and lobbying in amateur committees of some distant, foreign, allegedly non-commercial body which can actually determine what happens in a major sport present, is like a dinosaur which has had a toe severed by an adversary it cannot see.

wat action should be taken. Dr Kissinger is on the sidelines, for he has no official position following the inevitably doomed Stockholm bid, though seven weeks ago he was in favour of challenging FIFA if the USSF was short-changed.

Other reasons why militant USS officials want action concern more general aspects of FIFA's administration. Why, for instance, has no-one, not even any of the 24 participating finalists, challenged the fact that the World Cup accounts for 1982 in Spain do not show any figures for the marketing of official souvenirs and mementoes - prsumably a substan-tial sum - or that several bundreds of thousands of pounds was spent on buying out the unexpired contracts of two long-standing officials, Helmut Keiser, the former general secretary, and René Court, the former Press secretary? Not a few people will be watching events on August 28 with interest. Many of the grass-roots council members of the US been done with impunity.

It is now probably of academic interest only how the host American team might have fared had the finals been awarded to the US. In expectation of that, it was decided this season to form Team America to participate as a national side in the NASL; and, in their opening game, they had proved to be dour, difficult to beat, and occasionally dirty.

But, when, for the first time, they ran into real class on Wednesday night, they fell apart. New York Cosmos put four goals past them and it could have been eight in an exciting match watched by a 33,000 crowd in the breathtaking Glants Stadium at Meadow lands, East Rutherford, New

This gave him a three round total of 206, two strokes fewer than his nearest pursure, Hugh Baiocchi, of South Africa, (70 yesterday) and three fewer than Manuel Calero, of Spain

Darcy may not have been quite so tidy through the green this day, but the main difference was that his putter behaved more conventionally than on the day before when he seemed unable to fail from any distance any any direction. He took 34 putts yesterday, 25 the day before, showing the same disparity as his separate scores for the two rounds.

He reached the turn without a birdie to his record, an absurd contrast to Thursday, since he was hitting the greens with much the same regularity. He did get away with two wayward drives at the first two holes, first from a bunker and then from the light rough. Then, for a time, it was mundane stuff as the putts refused to drop -Darcy's nearest and dearest would not describe him as a shining personality - until he was hauled back from ten under par to nine under when he failed to get up and down from a bunker at the eighth.

Briefly, Darcy's overnight four-shot lead disappeared as Biocchi, his playing partner, profited from a blistering start. Biocchi played a seven iron to 8

Solent tide wears its best smile

By John Nicholls

For an hour or two yesterday morning, the Western Solent was not the piace for a faint-hearted yachtsman. Various clubs were starting races at about the same time and, altogether, there were more than 300 boats queueing up to start on the ebbing tide. First away were a fleet of French Royale cruiser racers accompanied by an escort vessel labelled Tour de France. One hopes they were not in Cowes by accident.
Next off were the various classes

No doubt there will be races within races on the way to France, with the Admiral's Cup contenders doing their best to upstage one another. Unfortunately, conditions were less than comfortable for exciting racing, with the tide doing more than the breeze to help the

TENNIS: DAVIS CUP QUARTER-FINALS UNDER WAY

Swede wilts under pressure

By Richard Eaton

As a home from home, Devon-shire Park, Eastbourne, worked out quite well yesterday. The New Zealanders got the baselining Swedes on to grass, Russell Simpson gained an impressive sounding win over Henrik Sundstrom, the world No 19 and choosing to play a Davis Cup tie on the wrong side of the Cup tie on the wrong side of the world seemed to be the right decision for a while for the men from down under.

crowd of about 2,500, all of which helped to put young Sundstrom, making his first Davis Cup appearance, under further pressure. It was another Swede, Jan-Erik Lundquist who is attributed with originating the phrase "grass is for cows." If ever anybody's expression embodied that sentiment it was Sundstrom's yesterday. He had set points in each of the first two sets, and played the third with a mixture of riskily flamboyant ground strokes, and rather disorier-tated looking service and volley. Sundstrom lost 9-7, 10-8 6-4 to a man 56 places below him in the world rankings, and admitted that world rankings, and admitted that he had been tactically timid. "I needed to attack, and I shall attack Lewis much more," he said. It was a predictable lesson, but at least one with practical consequences and possibly important ones for the whole tie.

Quite how far the sun bathing crowd, liberally sprinkled with foreign language students and senior critizens appreciated either this or the significance of Simpson's quietly the signmenter of similar squary sliced ground strokes and doged volleys, was another matter. One attempted service return from the Swede snicked on to a spectator's nose, another spectator took a full minute to clamber over seats in the middle of a game, causing the New Zealander to produce a double fault, and later Lewis bellowed angrily at others for laughing in the rally.

The start for Lewis, the New Zealand here was faltering perhaps predictably. He lost the first four games and was not far from losing a love set when break point down to lose the fifth game. He had, he admitted, been tired earlier in the week after his Wimbledon final, and week after his witholeoon man, and had been recuperating by listening to David Bowie, T. Rex and other old English rock music. "I can't believe that all that's

"I can't believe that all that's happened will hurt my performance." he said, "And I've never had trouble preparing for the Davis Cup". But it did not look that way. His opponent, Mats Wilander, had his own music, a symphony of service return winners against Lewis's variable delivery. The New Zealander's old problem front-fault. Zealander's old problem, foot-fault-ing, also began to reappear at important moments.

Lewis's best chance of making a psychological breakthrough came in the second set when he twice pulled back breaks of service to reach 5-5. However, another indifferent service game cost him a third break, and Wilander then served out to love to take a two-set lead, 6-4, 7-5. Wilander went on to win in four sets, 6-4, 7-5, 6-8, 10-8

Northamptonshire retained the Tikon Trophy by way of an emphatic victory against Yorkshire here, as the curtain fell on Harrogate's cricket week. Northamptonshire's success was a special triumph for Wayne Larkins who was the day's ourstanding bowler and batsman too. It was he who brought Yorkshire to their knees in the 13th over when he took the wickets of Kevin Sharp, Hartley and Love in four balls, and it was be-who came to the crease later to make a hard-hitting hundred. If Larkins' achievement assured him of the title Man of the Match, then he would be first to mention the part played by Tim Lamb and Williams, both of whom took two wickers, anienes George Sharp wickets apiece; George Sharp, behind the stumps, who held two fine catches among eight altogether; and Willey, who, like Larkins was in th the bat in making 64 not out. These two put on 175 runs for the second wicket.

If Yorkshire had been overwhelmed and outclassed, too, then their score of 178 in 54.3 overs one on the wrong side of 100. Yorkshire's members rose to make a special award, a standing ovation, It was all good festival stuff, and while there were undoubtedly a few dichards who might have not seen the joke when Bairstow got out, there were very many more, your correspondent included, who thought this moment to be the funniest yet seen on a cricket field.

Bairstow's attacking instinct, and his breezy, busting style makes him an engaging player to watch, and, as he lead his own counter attack all eyes around the bounderies were focused on him. We were in the 23rd overwhen a ball from Larkins hit Bairstow on the front pad end doubtful whether the ball would the bails on a line with the middle stump but Bairstow, who once turned down an offer to play for Bradford City, was taking no chances. He leapt upwards to head a coconut-type report. That, by itself was unbearably funny but when Bairstow then sent his stumps askew as he descended the hilarity was too much for Larkins who was soon in tears, and the rest, who fell about convulsed with laughter.

At lunch, at 100 for three, it looked as if New Zealand would bowl them out. There was not much batting to come. Stovold had been caught at slip and Remaines was run out, or rather ran himself out, for he hesitated in response to the striker's call for a fessible single. Hignell was bowled, beaten for pace, I thought by Snedden.

The pitch was easy; the kind of pitch where it is not too difficult to stay in, if you make up your mind not to get out. This was what Bainbridge basically did, thought he revealed from time to time his pleasing cover drives. It was his highest score in first-class cricket. Frankfurt (Reuter) – When the Dutch boxer Rudi Koopmans defends his European light-heavy-weight title here tonight against the local challenger Manfred Jassmann, two of the most interested spectators will be Americans.

The world champion Michael Spinks, the brother of the heavy-weight Leon Spinks, and his manager Bob Arum will be in ringside seats waiting to offer the winner a crack at the world title in a $250,000 match later this year.

A controversial figure, Jassman once slept through the weigh-in for the 1978 amateur final and though he later won the bout, the title was awarded to the loser. He was also given a two-month suspended jail sentence in 1979 for inflicting grievous bodily harm on someone he hit during a free-for-all

Fowler on Monday to protest at the £130m cutback in NHS

Mr Rodney Bickerstaffe, general secretary of the National Union of Public Employees, said that estimates of job losses in the NHS varied between 20,000 and 30,000. "It would be nonsense to suggest that other than thousands of jobs are at stake," he added.
"There is going to be one hell of a lot more trouble."

The £30m cut in the education budget is expected to mean less money for the universities, cuts in staffing and administration at the Department of Education and Science and a possible reduction in the student grant this autumn (Lucy Hodges, Education Correspondent, writes).

It amounts to a 1 per cent cut in the £3,000m budget which the department administers centrally. There will be no cut in the £9,000m sum which the local authorities receive for local authorities receive for education so schools remain untouched.

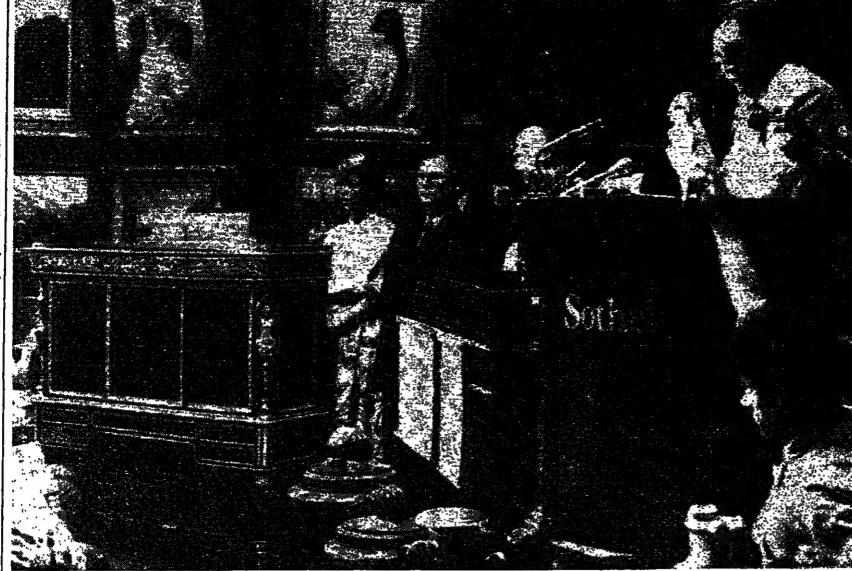

The student grant may also be cut because the regulations spelling out the agreed 4 per cent increase this autumn have not yet been made and can be

At the Ministry of Defence official began the task of seeking the savings demanded by the Chancellor. The cuts which the defence programme will have to bear in the present financial year will be £240m, made up of about £60m in manpower costs and administration, and £180m on capital spending.

Officials from Bush
House, headquarters of the BBC External Services, went to the Foreign Office to discuss a reported cuts of £1.2m in the department's £77m budget. If cuts are imposed they will b the eighth in 10 years.

The Foreign and Commonwealth Office will have to review its 199 overseas missions and its total staff requirement of 5,500, to make space for the Treasure cuts.

Historic treasure: The eighteenth century French cabinet is knocked down for the record price of £990,000 at Sotheby's in London

Louis XVI cabinet sells for record £990,000

By Geraldine Norman, Sale Room Correspondent

Mrs Seward Johnson, aged 46, who has inherited the Johnson baby powder and pharmaceuticals fortune, paid the record price of £990,000 for a French black lacquer cabinet at Sotheby's yesterday. It was the highest price recorded at auction for a piece of furniture.

She said afterwards: "I am a very discreet collector". Indeed, without drawing any attention to themselves she and her husband, who died eight weeks ago, aged 87, built a large Palladian residence outside Princeton, New Jersey, and over the past 10 years have filled it with Old Masters, Impression-furniture.

Mrs Seward Johnson said her husband had always dreamt of collecting art. "But he did not know how to start until I came along. I had a master's degree in history of art when I left Poland in 1968."

This summer she bought most of the finest furnishings offered at English auctions and set a new auction record for a pair of cusions at £15,120 at Christie's sale at Godmersham Park,

Yesterday's purchase was regarded as a bargain in the trade and, according to Mr Frank Partridge of Bond Street, it "was the linest piece of French furniture on the market for 20 or 30 years". "It should have fetched £2m," he added.

The exquisite cabinet was made from panels of black and gold Japanese lacquer with superb gilt-bronze mounts for King Louis XVI, almost certainly by the famouse cabinetmaker, Adam

It was delivered to Versailles for the king's study in 1784 and was one of the pieces of furniture that he chose to take with him when he was held "under house arresr" at the Taileries, before being sentenced to the guillotine.

Its history since it was recorded in a Tuileries inventory in 1790 is obscure,

Sotheby's disclosed that the sale was handled by lawyers in Switzerland. Mr Johnathon Bourne said yesterday: "Of course we pressed them about the recent history, but apparently the owner does not want to be known."

The expectations of a higher price were built on the expectation that the Getty Museum of Malibu, with their large purchaing power, would be interested. It was also considered that Versailles would make a big effort to be the control of the contr buy it back.

It is understood that a representative of Versailles was the undebidder at yesterday's sale and that the Getty Museum had agreed before the sale not to bid against Versailles.

Letter from Moldavia

Bread and butter issue upsets 'toaster capital'

for other products, mostly agricultural: its wines are distributed all over Russia, and it produces a third of the Soviet Union's tobacco, as well as chemies and strawberries galore.

But it is toasters that figure largely in Beltsy's exhibition of economic achievement. The Beltsy factory makes only one kind of toaster, a long, thin stainless steel model. But nobody else in the entire country makes any toasters at all. The situation exercises local officials a great deal, and has been taken up by the national press, which has dubbed it the "toaster-roaster" problem.

"Roaster" is the Russian for a mini-grill, and Beltsy is in the forefront of the controversy over whether the Soviet Union should produce more roasters than toasters, or vice versa. Nedelya, the Sunday supplement of Izvestiya, has pursued the question obsessively.

In a recent article headed "A toaster is a good thing", the paper complained that Beltsy, a small town not far from the Romanian border, should not have to carry the toaster burden on its own. Officials replied that a factory in Moscow would soon begin to turn out both toasters and roasters, and would produce a hundred thousand by 1985. Nedelya was not satisfied, and confronted the Minister for Electrotechnical Industries, Mr Mikhail Zhuchkov. Was it true that roasters were being given precedence over toast-ers? the paper demanded. Well yes, Mr Zhuchkov said.

Roasters were universal whereas toasters were not. Roasters could make toasted sandwiches, for example. "Nor is that all," the minister added. "Roasters are more technological, and easier to make." Officials in Beltsy were as puzzled by this paradox as most Nedelya readers, but Beltsy (pop 123,000) is the showed off their new model toaster capital of the Soviet roaster with pride. It did not Union. Moldavia is famous look particularly technologies roaster with pride. It did not look particularly technological. As for toasters, a new factory in Tbilisi in Georgia will follow the one in Moscow in 1986.

But surely demand outstrips supply? I was referred to Nedelya and Mr Zhuchkov. "Let us be self-critical," the minister suggested. "The fact is, we did not foresee the demand for this very handy appliance. In my opinion, every home should have one. He said his ministry had formed a special study group, and talked in visionary terms of a time when there would be 250,000 roasters and toasters on the market every year. At present the Beltsy factory has the capacity to produce up to 11,000 a year, although one official told us that it actually turned out only 800 toasters.

The serious side of toasters and roasters is that they make better use of bread, a constant theme in the Soviet press. Bread prices are deliberately kept low, although the real cost is growing due to grain imports. Yet a great deal goes to waste, with families throwing away stale loaves after a day or less.

The booklet which comes with the Beltsy toaster gives full and careful instructions to those who may not have seen a toaster before. It says you should use a sharp knife to cut the bread into slices no more than 12 millimetres thick, but than 12 millimetres thick, but without spreading butter, fat or anything else on them. You then take the slice (Figure 1) and place it in the slot (Figure 4), pressing down the knob (Figure 2). The booklet does not tell you what to do if the knob jams or will not stay down (all too frequent occu-rences in our household).

Still, it does list toaster repair shops in nine Soviet cities from Donetsk to Vilnius, which suggests that the toaster habit is catching on and Beltsy is pioneering yet another advance toward the consumer society.

In the garden

Herbs may be gathered now to dry for winter use — tie them in small bundles and hang in an airy shed, or lay in a single layer on trays in a cool any shed or garage.

Pests — greenfly and blackfly particularly — continue to be really troublesome, and are appearing on plants like campanulas, and likes which are not normally much troubled by them. They can also infest hedges, especially those of myrobolan and other prunuses, so check your hedges when inspecting the garden for possible trouble. RH
